THE HOUSE IN RECESS.

THE recess of the House will not have been wasted if it shows members that the feeling of the country was not exhausted by the autumn election. However it may appear in the obscuring atmosphere of Washington, there is a public determination that some reform shall be accomplished. However sure Republican leaders may be that the country will never intrust its welfare to the residuary legatees of the old pro-slavery, reactionary, Kentucky and Virginia-resolution Democracy, and however confident Democratic leaders may be that they are on the eve of a restoration, the fact remains that nothing is certain but the strict scrutiny which both parties are undergoing. Democrats who regard the result of the late elections as a Democratic victory wofully deceive themselves, and Republicans who think that the discontent will blow over are inviting party defeat. No American who believes sincerely in popular government had ever more reason to feel his faith justified than by recent events. For it is evident that when no vital national issue is imminent there is a body of voters, large enough to control the election, who will require something more than the party certificate of "regularity" as a reason for supporting the party. The especial point of scrutiny at this time is the debate upon reform in the civil service, a topic which was promptly introduced in both Houses at the opening of the session, although it has been deferred in the House of Representatives until the Senate should have taken action.

There is one remark which has been made in the Senate during this debate which we trust will be effectually disposed of should it be repeated in the House. It is the assertion that the whole debate raises a great wind about a very little matter; that while grave and important questions demand the most careful consideration, Congress is squandering time upon the method of appointing fourth-grade clerks in the departments. This is an attempt to belittle the whole subject as unworthy the serious attention of Congress. Now if the only question were of the manner in which the thousands of subordinate employés of the government should be selected, it would not be a subject undeserving the attention of a representative body which appropriates millions of dollars of the public money for the compensation of such employés, nor would it be a despicable subject to the people who are taxed to raise those millions. But unless the corruption of politics, the degradation of the public service, dishonest elections, the total perversion of the function of party, and the practical exclusion of the people from the control of the government are matters too contemptible for the attention of Congress, there is no public question which is so vital and important as that which such statesmen as VOORHEES and BROWN and PLUMB try to ridicule. Of that question Mr. HEWITT, of New York, one of the most intelligent and able of the Democratic Representatives both in this and in the next Congress, wrote on the 25th of October, 1882, as we stated last week: "Unless the system which now prevails of appointment to office, and of organizing the offices-holders into a ring for keeping themselves in office, shall be reformed, our system of free government will be destroyed, and the generation which permits such a calamity to occur will prove that it is unworthy of the privileges which it received from the fathers of the republic." These words are the echo of those which were spoken by the greatest statesmen fifty years ago, when the abuses which are now known as the spoils system became the accepted practice of the national government. It may seem very undignified for the captain and crew of a stately man-of-war to devote themselves to stopping a little hole in the side of the vessel. But through that little hole the ocean is making its way, and will sink the ship. Patronage and bribery of votes were the means by which the contest for liberty between the English crown and the English people was carried on in Parliament after it ceased to be a conflict of arms in the field; and patronage, or the personal and political system of subordinate employment, which Messrs. BROWN, VOORHEES, and PLUMB think too petty a matter for Congressional attention, degrades an American election from an honorable contest of differing policies determined by free argument before the people into a fierce and desperate struggle for the vast emoluments of minor place.

The real scope of reform, therefore, is not limited to the details of the public service. It is not a question merely of more or less knowledge among employés, or of the relative merits of a competitive or pass examination. These are all means to an end. They are the fuel under the furnace. But without watchfulness in the hold the vessel will not move, and there will be no voyage. The late address of the National Civil Service Reform League to the voters states the purpose and scope of the movement:

"It proposes the restoration of political parties to their legitimate function as organized agencies of the popular will, the overthrow of government by patronage, the emancipation of the suffrage and of the press from a corrupt personal servility, the elevation of the standards of public character and service, and it proposes to accomplish these results by means which will place the transaction of the public business upon a business basis, open the public service to all the people, restore the self-respect of the public agents, and promote, as nothing else can promote, the cause of popular education."

It is by their disposition toward this reform that the two parties are now to be tested. Thus far the Democrats have lost ground in the debate. In the Senate, while admirable speeches for reform have been made by eminent Democrats, such as Mr. BAYARD, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. JONES, and others, the active opposition has been Democratic. In the House, the test of fidelity to the cause will not be support of some apparent measure of reform like the KASSON bill, but of a bill which, having passed the Senate, needs only the assent of the House to become a law to which the President's approval has been promised. Those Representatives who sincerely desire to yield to the reform sentiment of the country will support a measure which that sentiment approves. There need be no supposition that that sentiment has blown over, or is going to blow over, in any other sense than that of blowing over the party that opposes it. The deep and persistent distrust of the Democratic party still remains, and defeat of reform by Democratic tricks and machinations will array the whole independent vote against the Democratic party in the election of 1884, because it would be clear that in the event of success that party contemplated a "clean sweep," to which the country will not consent. On the other hand, the Republicans are responsible for legislation, and defeat of reform will go far to make Republican success in 1884 impossible.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND, of New York, enters upon his administration under peculiar and trying circumstances. He was elected by the largest majority ever cast for a Governor. He is a Democrat, but his election, as he knows, did not signify confidence in the Democratic party. It was a rebuke of the management of the Republican party as careless of its traditions and of the purpose of a great body of Republicans. In a word, Governor CLEVELAND'S election was a declaration of political independence, not of party preference. But he, nevertheless, is a Democrat. His few speeches since the election have shown that he comprehends the situation. He has been wisely reticent. Amid conflicting rumors, no information of his purpose has been traced to him, and the new year ushers him upon a scene where his sagacity, his courage, his tenacity, will all be severely tried. His own party is torn by an old and fierce contention. Each Democratic faction will watch with jealous suspicion every act of the new Governor, who will be conscious also that the great independent Republican body, which directly or indirectly promoted his election, will scan curiously his course.

If the Governor be a man of political comprehension and insight, he will undoubtedly perceive that the political situation is exceptional and transitional. Parties cohere, but the reason of parties has disappeared. There are no fundamental principles of government, no measures of administrative policy, upon which parties are divided. There are Democratic protectionists and Republican revenue reformers. Both parties demand a revision of the tariff, reduction of taxation, and economy of administration. There is no distinctive Republican or Democratic financial policy, or Indian policy, or foreign policy. Both parties demand reform, interpreting the word at their pleasure. It is an era of personal politics, and such an era always implies the disappearance of actual political division. Personal politics are always malignant, and when they are paramount there is inevitably great bitterness of feeling. This is obvious now. The sharpest conflict is that of factions within the parties, not of the parties with each other. In such a situation an extreme partisan position is unwise, and the true course for Governor CLEVELAND would be to show himself an independent Democrat. This course would draw upon him the abuse of the party organs; but at a time like this such abuse is merely dumb barking. Executive ability combined with courageous independence would secure the public confidence, and the Governor has doubtless learned that there is a popular judgment quite distinct from that of professional politicians.

In nothing will the Governor's conduct be scrutinized more closely than in appointments to office. The terms of a great number of the most honorable and most desirable State offices will expire within a short time after the inauguration, and there are three Railroad Commissioners to appoint under the new law. If the offices controlling large patronage should be filled by mere Democratic politicians, and if other officers, especially managers of charitable institutions who serve without salary, should be removed solely for party reasons, the facts would be carefully noted and remembered to the extreme disadvantage of the Governor. It is a sound rule which Presidents MONROE and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS observed in the national administration, and which Governor THOMPSON has just followed in South Carolina, to re-appoint meritorious officers. Without exception Governor THOMPSON has re-appointed all the five or six hundred State officers whose terms had expired. They were, indeed, of his own party, but the expiration of a term is generally held to be sufficient reason for a change of the incumbent. In South Carolina, however, without regard to legislative delegations and recommendations, every officer who desired a re-appointment has been continued, unless he were ineligible or incapable. Of this wise course the Charleston News and Courier says—and its words are worthy of Governor CLEVELAND'S attention as those of the leading Democratic journal in the Southern States:

"Possibly officers of average merit will be retained when men of higher capacity could have been obtained. But the effect will be most salutary on the long run. There will be more care than usual in filling vacancies when it is realized that the appointee is likely to remain in office for an indefinite time. And those who desire a change in the offices must come prepared with proof of unfaithfulness or incapacity. It will be a happy day when it is a settled fact that the only non-political offices to be scrambled for at an election are those where the prize is awarded by the vote of the people at the polls."

PRESIDENTIAL "INABILITY."

AMONG the important recommendations in the President's Message is that which refers to the method of ascertaining the vote for Presidential electors, and the intention of the Constitution in devolving executive functions upon the Vice President in case of the inability of the President. The last subject especially is suggested with great pertinence by President ARTHUR, whose conduct during the total executive disability of his predecessor was most admirable. The peace of the country lay wholly at his discretion, and nothing could have been more patriotic or wiser than his demeanor. If in the middle of August, 1881, when it was perfectly well known that President GARFIELD was absolutely incapacitated for the proper discharge of any official function, the Vice-President had announced that in his judgment the inability contemplated by the Constitution existed, and that he should act as President until in his judgment the disability should be removed, the whole country would have been thrown into confusion. But who could have demonstrated the unconstitutionality of such action? Who could feel sure that, if a man like General BUTLER were Vice-President under such circumstances, he would not take precisely this course? The country owes President ARTHUR a cordial recognition of his prudent, moderate, and patriotic bearing when he might have pleaded the plain words of the Constitution for revolutionary action.

It is in harmony with his conduct at that time that the President proposes to Congress to remedy the dangerous omission of the Constitution and the laws in regard to this provision. It is in no sense a party question, and a simple and sensible arrangement should not be difficult. But there would be such apprehension that in some way party advantage might be derived from it that adequate legislation can not be fairly expected. It is none the less desirable, and negligence or failure to consider the question will be scored against this Congress. The avoidance by Congress of all such legislation, which strengthens the foundations of the government and secures its smooth working, is one of the evils that spring from the party system. The public welfare, as an object independent of party advantage, is disregarded. No more pitiful illustration of the stupefying and belittling influence of mere party spirit as applied to a great public question could be found than the recent speech of Mr. WILLIAMS, a Senator from Kentucky, upon the PENDLETON reform bill. The only reform that is wanted, said this statesman, is a clean sweep of Republicans. This spirit, which contemplates nothing but the possible mercenary profit of a party, is the precise spirit against which WASHINGTON warned his countrymen.

The importance of the other suggestion of the President, that of providing a satisfactory method of settling the Presidential election, is emphasized by the situation six years ago at this time, when the country hung upon the edge of civil war, and was saved mainly by the vivid recent experience at that time of what civil war means. The failure to provide a remedy for the startling omission of the Constitution to define its intention is one of the justest reproaches of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses. The subject has been thoroughly discussed and considered. Able reports have been made upon it, and satisfactory bills drawn, but the fear that some party would somehow gain some advantage has produced the usual paralysis, and nothing is yet done. Experience has disclosed a state of things wholly unforeseen by the country when the Twelfth Amendment, which assumes to regulate the matter, was adopted. The discretion of the Vice-President, the decision between contesting certificates, the procedure in case of challenge of a regular certificate—indeed, all the details upon which the continuous peaceful operation of the government depends are not authoritatively defined. The dangers arising from the omission have been revealed. The necessity of proper legislation is demonstrated. It would avert a vital peril which overhangs every Presidential election. But the WILLIAMS wisdom of statesmanship will probably again prevail, and the country will proceed to the election of 1884 in the happy go-lucky faith that Providence takes care of the United States and drunkards. Senator VEST, of Missouri, is very much troubled by the press and platform criticisms of public men. But if he wishes to silence it, he could not do it more effectually than by persuading the Senate to pass Mr. HOAR'S bill providing for the succession in case of the death, disability, or removal of both the President and the Vice-President, and Mr. EDMONDS'S bill for determining the electoral vote, and by introducing an adequate bill defining the method of determining Presidential inability.

THE PASSAGE OF THE PENDLETON BILL.

THE passage of the PENDLETON bill by the Senate is an important event in our political history. It is the first practical legislative step toward the correction of abuses of administration involving dangerous consequences which are plainly perceived and universally acknowledged. It is a measure which, should it become law, will overthrow the aristocracy of patronage and spoils, and open the public service to all the people. It will not, indeed, purify politics at a blow. There will still be corruption and demagogism, and no good citizen can put off his armor of diligent watchfulness and effort. But it is not an argument against sanitary regulations that they do not abolish disease, nor against penal laws that crime still continues. It is no reason for refusing to try to improve a situation that still further improvement may be possible. The passage of this bill by the Senate is a prompt response to a public demand unmistakably expressed at the autumn election, and it is a significant sign of the immediate influence of sound public opinion upon legislation.

The vote as recorded was 39 to 5, and there were seven pairs, making the actual vote 46 to 12. Of the 46 affirmative votes 29 were Republicans, 16 were Democrats, and 1 was independent. The 12 negative votes were Democrats. The 16 affirmative Democratic votes were all from the Southern States. The bill was adopted substantially as it was prepared by the New York Civil Service Reform Association. Many amendments intended to weaken and cripple it were rejected, and Senator HAWLEY'S stringent prohibition of assessments by officers of the government, including members of Congress, an admirable amplification of the original bill, was adopted. The bill now goes to the House, and, as we say elsewhere, its defeat there would be a serious blow to the party responsible for the defeat.

The awakening of public sentiment which has produced this great result is largely due to two very different events—the murder of GARFIELD and the assessments of HUBBELL. Last spring Mr. HUBBELL issued his circulars as a matter of course. The storm that followed showed how truly the public mind attributed the murder of GARFIELD to the spoils system. The result was impressive. Before the year ended the action of HUBBELL had been condemned by the Supreme Court, and the Senate of the United States had unanimously made it a penal offense. The history of the year upon this subject exhorts every friend of wise progress to trust the people, and never to despair.

THE "BYSTANDER."

We see with pleasure that Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, who has returned from England, begins with the new year a new quarterly series of the Bystander. The title is peculiarly appropriate for a man who views public affairs and comments upon them with the conviction that party is as evil as which modern political society is mature enough to discumbarrass itself. But as a practical observer and critic the Bystander accepts the actual situation, and it has already established a reputation for vigorous, incisive, and sagacious criticism and suggestion.

The Bystander will be the most independent of Canadian journals, and as it covers the whole range of Canadian interests, it will be for outsiders the best source of general information. It holds that the English connection is unwise, and that independent citizenship is better than dependency, the true position for England being that of the mother of free nations. Meanwhile, of course, it will judge questions by the established system, without failing to show where another system might work more advantageously.

The editor's singular fitness for his task is well known, and if as much literary and historical accomplishment and ability, already displayed in valuable works, are not to be concentrated upon the history of some great epoch, it is most fortunate that they will be devoted, partly at least, to the elucidation of our own time. The field of the Bystander's observation is the world, and it is watched by no amateur eye.

THE publication of HAWTHORNE'S posthumous romance, Dr. Grimshawe's Secret, is a most interesting literary event, and the interest is enhanced by the simultaneous publication of his notes and sketches for the work, the extraordinary record of the process of its construction—a record without precedent in literary history. The idea of the tale was long in his mind. Like a ghost it haunted him, and he felt himself bereft of the power to lay it by letting it have its way. The fitting treatment of the theme constantly eluded him, and on his son, JULIAN HAWTHORNE, the editor, points out, he locates himself with his singular inability to achieve the work which he was yet conscious must be accomplished.

The result of a struggle as microscopically observed and recorded in detail will be studied with intense interest. The romance as published is a consecutive tale proceeding steadily from the opening to the close. It is characteristically powerful, and the "uncanny" play of the great romancer's imagination was never more fully displayed. The characters are few, as usual with HAWTHORNE, but they are definitely bodied forth, and across the dark plot flash and glance those rays of sweet and perfect sunshine which are to less native to his imaginative world than its more habitual lurid gleam.

It is evident, however, that although the tale is continuous and in a sense complete, it is not in the form that HAWTHORNE would have finally given to it. The earlier part and portions of the later part are carefully and perhaps to the author unsatisfactorily elaborated, but he would doubtless have gone over the whole, modifying and more clearly developing his intention. The story is a romance, and not what is now understood to be a novel. In one of the notes HAWTHORNE states this fact distinctly, and nothing could be more different from the usual novel than Dr. Grimshawe's Secret. That the author might not have published it to its precise present form is not a reason that this tale should have remained unknown. It is the nearly finished picture of a great master, in which his characteristic genius is fully displayed, and which lacks only some of the final touches which would have heightened and refined, but not essentially have changed, the effect.

INCREASE OF ILLITERACY.

IN a late address in New York, Mr. EATON, United States Commissioner of Education, stated some interesting and suggestive facts:

"The colored persons ten years of age and upward unable to write, as returned by the late census, number 3,220,878, or a number equal to the entire population when the original thirteen States were united under one form of government. The foreign white population of ten years of age and upward unable to write numbers 763,620, and the number of native white persons of the same age unable to write is 2,235,400. The total number of persons of ten years and over in all the States unable to write is 6,239,958, showing, as compared with similar figures from the census of 1870, relatively a gain of three per cent in intelligence, but an absolute gain in the number of illiterates of 881,014, in spite of all the educational activities of the intermediate ten years."

Of schools and the attendance upon them, Mr. EATON says that "there are 88 law schools, with over 3000 students; 120 medical schools, with 14,000 students; 364 universities and colleges, with 80,000 students, and that there have been bestowed during the past ten years $61,000,000 by private individuals for educational purposes, and that there are 9,000,000 children in attendance on public schools, and an expenditure of $80,000,000 for their conduct. But we must look on the reverse side. New England now has only one college student to every 767 families, while twenty-three years after the first settlement there was one university graduate to every forty families. And against the school attendance three is the non-attendance of 5,400,000 children throughout the country. To furnish these with schools would cost $100,000,000, an addition of 30,000 teachers, whose preparation would cost $1,000,000, and whose pay for a single year would be $9,600,000, or to supply the new attending children with house-room and teachers would cost $110,000,000. In our cities we have the best teachers, houses, and method; but, with all these advantages, about two-fifths of the children of school age do not attend school."

Mr. EATON proposes that Congress shall aid the struggling efforts for education in the States and Territories. The constitutional warrant of the power to Congress to afford such aid is, in the opinion of the trustees of the PEABODY fund, undeniable. A committee of the trustees, composed of Chief Justice WAITE, Mr. EVARTS, and Mr. A. H. H. STUART of Virginia, holds that the constitutional right of Congress to contribute to the education of citizens of the States is res adjudicata. There are innumerable laws for the purpose, and their constitutionality has never been questioned. The PEABODY trustees state that the United States have granted to the State of Minnesota alone lands for the purpose of education which have a money value of nearly $20,000,000. Congress has granted an enormous area of land for the aid of railroad enterprises, and whatever has been granted to aid education has received general approval. The question is not of constitutional objection, but of the best method of applying the aid. The bill of Mr. SHERWIN, reported last May, withholds further aid from any State which shall have misapplied any part of such a grant. But misappropriation can not be readily proved. This is not an insuperable difficulty, indeed, but it is a difficulty. The need and the desirability of a wise and practicable method of dealing with illiteracy are obvious, and aid should be given in a way to stimulate State effort, and this we understand to be the purpose of the SHERWIN bill.

THE HAND OF THE GREAT STATUE.

THE illustration upon another page of one of the hands of the great statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," which is to be erected in the harbor, will renew the reader's interest in that patriotic project. The subscription proceeds actively, and it is to be assumed that the American welcome of this significant gift will not be less generous than the French offer. With characteristic national modesty we might well have hesitated to present ourselves to the world as the genius of liberty. But when an ancient nation and a friendly republic offers as the prodigious compliment of erecting to our chief port, the thronged gateway of the continent, a figure typical of Liberty enlightening the world, on especially appropriate for us alone among nations, it is a tribute to which we can not fail to respond. The details mentioned in the article accompanying the illustration are very interesting, and the generous subscription which the sample hand invites will be a noble beginning of the new year.

PERSONAL.

In the death of ALPHEUS CROSBY SUTHERLAND has lost her most influential statesman. For twenty-five years he was the leader of the Liberal party. One of his great achievements was the organization of the St. Gothard Railway, which by his perseverance and courage was carried to completion.

—Of the late Mr. HENRY JAMES the Rev. Dr. BARTOL in a note writes: "To one who sacramentally criticised a paper of his at the Radical Club, defending the supernatural in the Gospel story, he, with a sharpness of marvellous humility, replied, 'Yes, I must confess I am an abject Christian.'"

—Mr. JOHN E. BUCHTEL, of Ohio, has sold $200,000 worth of stock in the Buckeye Works in order to make an additional gift of $100,000 to Bechtel College. The gift will be formally tendered on January 18, the anniversary of the founding of the college. In addition to this, Mrs. L. A. E. MESSENGER, of Akron, has added a gift of $25,000 to Mr. BUCHTEL'S endowment, and it is said that other large gifts are to be made that will swell the total to about $250,000.

—The Rev. GARDNER COLTON, of Greenwich, Connecticut, has been called to the pastorship of the Old South Church, Boston—one of the "softest," as it is one of the most historical, pulpits in the United States. The salary is $6000 a year and parsonage. Mr. COLTON is a Scotchman, thirty years old, and unmarried. He worked his way through Harvard, overcoming many obstacles incident to poverty, and graduated with high honors. President ELIOT speaks of him as one of the most remarkable graduates for many years.

—The late JAMES S. PIKE, of Calais, Maine, after bequeathing life-estates to his wife and daughter, divided the bulk of his property for the establishment of a free library and reading room on the old PIKE homestead, which is given for that purpose, and for distributions of food and fuel by the Ladies' Benevolent Society among the poor who have not been paupers.

—The King of SIAM has recently invited young Mr. LOSSOWYNE to Bangkok, giving him the appointment of "Grand Master of the House," with a residence and large salary. It will be remembered that Mrs. LOSSOWYNE was the English governess of the King in his youth.

—The original manuscript of "Home, Sweet Home," as written by JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, is now in the possession of an elderly lady in Athens, Georgia. The words of the poem as first written are all interlined, with here and there an endearing expression from the writer to the lady who now holds it, to whom in the old days he was devotedly attached, and who has many of his letters. She has been offered a large sum for the manuscript.

—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, on retiring from his professorship at Harvard, received the following pleasant greeting from London Punch:

"Your health, dear 'Autocrat'! All thanked owes
Your instrument's the lyre, and not 'the house.'
Yet bear our wishes—trust us they're not void omens!—
That though you give up boots, you may make old ones."

—Once in a way a pleasant "personal" crops out from Connecticut. Thus it is said that recently at a meeting of the Congregational Club at Hartford the Rev. NEWMAN SMYTH presented some of his theological views, upon which the good brother who followed him said: "The advanced ground taken could compare with that of an architect who should now propose an improvement in St. Peter's at Rome by the addition of fifty bay windows."

—Governor PATTISON, who has just seated himself in the Executive chair of Pennsylvania, is the youngest man who ever been Governor of that State. He is only thirty-two years of age. He is the nineteenth Governor, and the only one not a native of the State. The next youngest on the list was WILLIAM BIGLER, who was inaugurated at the age of thirty-eight. The longest-lived of them all was JOSEPH RITNER, who died at ninety.

—JAMES MCMILLAN, an opulent citizen of Detroit, has purchased the Shakspearean library of E. H. THORNTON, of Flint, Michigan, and will present it to the Michigan University. This is said to be the completest and largest private Shakspearean collection in the world.

—The Archbishop of York has a playful way of alluding to the red-letter days of his career. Chatting recently with some brother bishops, he said, "My first preferment came to me at the birth of my first child, a bishopric on the birth of my second, and my archbishopric on the birth of a third." "Well," said Bishop WILBERFORCE, with a twinkling eye and bland tone, "we must hope that Mrs. THOMSON will not put you in the way of any further promotion at present, for there are but two more translations open to you—Canterbury and heaven—and you are not yet fit for either, I fear."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

MR. GLADSTONE has made an appointment to the vacant archiepiscopate of Canterbury which will most likely be satisfactory to all England. Though himself a High-Churchman, he has selected a representative of the Broad-Church school, the Rev. EDWARD WHITE BENSON, Bishop of Truro, in Cornwall. Dr. BENSON is one of the younger bishops, having been consecrated in 1877, when the see of Truro was created out of Exeter. According to the rule which prevails in regard to all the new dioceses, he has not heretofore been a member of the House of Lords. For this reason he is less known to the world than the occupants of the ancient sees. Before his appointment to Truro he was Canon of Lincoln, and also Chancellor, and Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH. Bishop BENSON has always held high rank as a scholar. At Cambridge he obtained the highest honors both in the classics and the mathematics. In 1852 he graduated B.A., in 1855 M.A., and was made Doctor of Divinity in 1867. He has also done service as tutor in Rugby School, and was Head Master of Wellington College from its opening till 1872, when he became Canon of Lincoln.

The career of Archbishop TAIT has made it indispensable that the Archbishop of Canterbury of this generation should be a man of vigor. He himself said, during his last illness, "The Church and the world seem entering on totally new phases." Archbishop TAIT was a man of prodigious working force, and we may be well assured that Archbishop BENSON will not be a man of negations. The appointment is a recognition of the Church theory of the Broad school—a theory which, though never formally accepted, has shaped the opinions of STANLEY, MAURICE, and other Churchmen less known to fame. Dr. THOMAS ARNOLD, who, if not its author, was its earnest advocate, held that the Church and the state [illegible] tical, that the Church is the state per[illegible] and that the Church of England properly con[illegible] Christian people of England. No theory of the Church is a better corrective of bigotry, and when it is held, not in the sense of doctrinal indifference, but in the form of a tolerant charity, it greatly smooths the path of an English bishop. Dr. TAIT showed that he was well aware of the fact that the Church of England is a harmony of opposites, a reconciliation of conflicting [illegible] opposing schools of theology may draw [illegible] cles and Liturgy. And it seems probable, from all [illegible] of the new Primate, that he will administer in much the same spirit.

Officially the Archbishop of Canterbury is first peer in England, ranking next to the princes of the blood. His style and title are "Primate of all England and Metropolitan." An English authority informs us that "at coronations it is his duty and privilege to place the crown on the sovereign's head; and wherever the court may be, the King and Queen are the proper domestic parishioners of the Archbishop." His diocese of Canterbury embraces Kent, with one or two points in Surrey; his province, twenty-two dioceses. He has two palaces for residence, Lambeth and Addington, and a yearly revenue of £15,000. As to patronage, he has the nomination to over a hundred and eighty livings.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

THE HAND OF "LIBERTY."

THE sketch which we publish in this number will enable our readers to understand, better than any description could, the mode of construction of the remarkable statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," which is being prepared in Paris for presentation to the city of New York. M. BARTHOLDI, the ingenious and daring designer of this statue, is already famous for the skill with which he has handled colossal subjects; far apart from the genius necessary to form a grandiose conception of such a work of art as that with which the friendship of the two great republics of the world is to be celebrated, there is required an [illegible] of mechanical knowledge to bring it to completion. The resources of modern mechanics render this a matter of comparative certainty. The sculptor is no longer required to perform such prodigies of labor or to undergo such agony of suspense and fear as those described by BENVENUTO CELLINI in his lecture, [illegible] published, containing an ac[illegible] his "[illegible]" and "[illegible]." But though the artist of to-day goes [illegible] his task with confidence in its accomplishment, the erection of a statue of more than 135 feet in height—not counting the pedestal—to stand in an exposed situation, unsheltered by adjacent structures, is decidedly the most gigantic enterprise of its kind.

The work is [illegible] on in the yards of [illegible], in Paris. The [illegible] represents will [illegible] feet [illegible] inches) in length, [illegible] finger will [illegible] 48 metres in [illegible] long, with a circumference at the [illegible] joint of about 7 feet 6 inches, and [illegible] of the finger will possess [illegible] about 13 inches by [illegible]. The [illegible] enormous dimensions of the statue [illegible] [illegible] plates of hammered [illegible] The method of construction [illegible] the drawing [illegible] M. BARTHOLDI [illegible] reproduced four times larger [illegible] Models in plaster of the head [illegible] [illegible] nulla dies sine linea [illegible]

These are then so arranged together as to form a species of imprint of the parts to which they have been applied, and make what are technically termed gabarits, or wooden moulds, into which the hammerers press the copper sheets by the pressure of levers, or by beating with hammers. The copper is then finished by [illegible] with smaller hammers or rods, outside and inside, to conform closely to the lines of the forms desired, which have been taken in detail by means of sheets of lead pressed upon the model. The workman in doing this part of his task places himself directly before the plaster models, and compares every part as he proceeds with the utmost patience and exactness. This done, the separate pieces are carried to an immense court to be placed together, and fixed upon a powerful frame-work of iron, which supports what may be called the entire envelope of the statue. When the statue is removed for transportation, it will be taken apart in more than 200 pieces. Its entire weight will be some 450,000 pounds, of which over 200,000 pounds will be copper, and the remainder the iron frame-work.

The workshops and yards of Messrs. GAGET, GAUTHIER, & Co. are thrown open to the subscribers to the statue, to witness the process of construction, on Thursdays and Sundays of each week, and the pupils of the School of Fine Arts are also admitted free. Those who are not subscribers can obtain admission by purchasing an engraving of the monument, which is sold for the benefit of the work, in all sizes and states of perfection, from those costing ten cents only to the elaborate representations of the various parts. The place is much frequented, particularly on Sundays, which is the Parisian holiday for all sorts of diversions, from sight-seeing to a revolution. The great yards are a veritable spectacle in themselves, but the motley gathering of visitors is still more of one. The workmen in their caps and blouses are a noticeable element, and occasionally an impromptu orator will address his chance audience with a glowing eulogium of America in terms which the wandering citizen of this happy land does not always recognize as truthful, and sometimes thanks Heaven that they are not. But the impressionable hearers drink in the praises of the ideal republic with eagerness, and reward the speaker with cries of "Vive la liberté!" "Vive la République Américaine!" The great work of M. BARTHOLDI has, moreover, been carefully inspected by many of the sculptors and engineers of the Continent, and has given rise to much discussion as to its probable stability, as well as its artistic merits. The verdict, on the whole, has been one of approval, and there is no reasonable doubt that when it is securely placed on the pedestal which Mr. EVARTS's committee is to prepare, it will be a worthy symbol of the generous sentiment to the expression and perpetuation of which it is consecrated.

HAIL, THOU NEW YEAR!

Hail, thou New Year! tho' thou hast come so soon,
I'm hardly willing yet to say good-by
To the old friend who lays aside his crown,
And to the grave of Time Box down to die.
I had grown fond of him, and learned to know
The faults and virtues of the dear Old Year;
He brought me many a comfort, many a joy,
Although—ah, yes—he caused me many a tear.

But for the tears, so often me they flowed,
He gave me peace, he gave me smiles again,
And taught me to look upward to Hope's skies,
And see the rainbow gleaming through the rain.
The dear Old Year! He came as merrily
As thou dost come, just twelve short months ago;
And now, because he has grown old at last,
Shall we forget the faithful life! Ah, no!

Thou art a stranger; what know men of thee?
Thy promises may all be fair not bright;
But many a morning dawning cloudlessly
Has brought a weary day and stormy night.
Well, so will welcome thee, ay, trust thee too;
Thy face is fair and young and glad, and we Will ask a blessing on thy reign, O king,
Till a new year shall take thy throne from thee.

FIVE YEARS AFTERWARD.

CHAPTER XIV.—(Continued.)

THE SECRET OF THE MURDER.

"True to Peter Spilkins?" she said, addressing Fladge without moving her head.

"Yes, that's 'ee," said Fladge.

"Asleep?"

"Oh no; wide awake and looking at 'ee," cried Fladge; "he's rare and lively a bit now. Aren't 'ee, Spilkins?"

Spilkins, with apparent difficulty, winked one eye, and this was evidently intended to convey an assent in the affirmative.

"What do you want with me?" said Miss Brake to the invalid. "What do you think you can tell me that I should be glad to know? See, I am here at your side."

Mr Spilkins did not appear to be particularly struck by this appeal, so by the honor of Miss Brake's company that evening, after all; so he might be considering whether her address was not a little peremptory, for he did not respond to her, although his eyelashes quivered a little, and the eyes began to open more, and stare at the stained ceiling above his head, so if to expt attention of two blasted flies there.

"Dumb?" asked Miss Brake of the younger men.

Fladge croaked forth a feeble little laugh of his old double-knock pattern, and said—

"Oh! he'll talk enough soon; she old 'un takes time at come out of his sleeps—an awful time—always," was the slow, jerky answer, and without looking at his questioner

"I see is on hurry. I will wait for him," said Miss Brake.

"He won't talk many times longer, anyhow," said Fladge, with a second laugh still less hilarious than the preceding; "he's a main bit weaker—half a corpse, as more, already. Ain't you, Peter?"

Peter winked, so blinked, both eyes now; but that might have been as an expression of dissent on this occasion, for the shaggy white eyebrows were lowered ominously over them.

Fladge took on head of this, but went on with singular disregard of any feelings which Mr Spilkins might possibly happen to possess.

"The doctor says this is just about the end of him—and time it was. He's been a rare nonsance the last four year or so, they say; and they'll be glad enough when he's stowed away for good. I she'a't."

"You like him, Fladge?" said the visitor.

"He's been kind to me; he's bt me stop here and talk to him, poor old devil," said Fladge, "and hide away from Mr Woodhatch, and Greg Dorward, and all the rest of 'em over yonder. You know—you know."

"Yes, I know."

"And he's been a-worrying about you, mum—dreadful—all the day. That's why I came over to 'ee, you know."

"I know," echoed Miss Brake again.

"He's not up at much, just now," said Fladge, "but he'll wake all of a sudden and 'stonish 'ee. Oh! he's a rum 'un—you won't mind him, lady, if he goes it overmuch?"

"What is he thinking about?" she asked.

Fladge looked at Mr. Spilkins more intently; then suddenly sprawled full length across the bed, and without the least consideration for the old gentleman's inner flanks, reached out two long arms and caught hold of the patient's lower jaw. Then ensued a mysterious operation of some kind, fully explained after Fladge had resumed his monkey-like attitude round the bedpost.

"Quid wrong," explained Fladge; "just newlering it—that's all."

Mr Spilkins began slowly to munch and mumble his tobacco, and Miss Brake turned to Reuben Fladge at more genial or communicative company.

"Why do you want to hide away from Mr. Woodhatch?" she asked, in allusion to a previous remark of Reuben's; "he is more likely to be your friend than enemy—is he not?"

"No—not any friend to me. Oh no!—oh no!" cried Fladge.

"You and my brother Morris were dismissed together from the farm?"

"Ay."

"Has he not forgiven that?"

"I don't know. He was main hard on me—he wouldn't hear a word," muttered Fladge, his face falling quickly into shadow.

"He was hard on Morris too; but I do not blame him," said Miss Brake; "he had been deceived by those in whom he had put faith. That makes a man—or woman—very hard indeed."

She stared at the little strong-smelling parlor-loop upon the table by the side of the basin and tobacco, rather than at Reuben Fladge, and for a moment appeared to have forgotten him. It was only when he broke suddenly into a very husky cough that she looked up again.

"There is something more which makes John Woodhatch hard as you," she said; "I, who know him better than you, am sure enough of that."

"He's awful hard," muttered Fladge.

"You had only to say to him, 'Master, forgive me. I am very sorry. I was only a lad, and led away,' and he would not have left you to sink to this miserable plight," said Miss Brake, earnestly.

Reuben Fladge crossed his arms on the round top of the half-upright bamboo bed-post, and hid his face upon them, leaving only his shock head of hair visible to the visitor.

"Ay—that's true," he muttered, "he might 'a done so once, afore he thought so bad o' me—afore he thought I'd killed your brother Morris"

"John Woodhatch thought you did it?" exclaimed Hester Brake, with new interest.

"Ay, and a good many more than Master Woodhatch. I don't know why," moaned Fladge, "except I did not like Morris, after he had got me into trouble, and I said as afore he was found dead by the parson's house. That's all. That's all I did."

"Have you seen Mr. Woodhatch since that night?"

"Once. And he told me I'd killed Morris—he was sure of it—and he'd have the law o' me, when he could."

"He said as much as that?"

"He did."

Miss Brake looked intently at Reuben Fladge now, leaning forward to peer more closely into his face.

"Did you quarrel with my brother on the night John Woodhatch was—so hard?" she asked, after a pause.

"Yes. We had words, o' course," replied Fladge.

"And you did not kill him?" she asked, sharply

"I never had the chance," was the curious answer, "and you ain't come to hear me say I did."

"What am I here for?"

"To hear me say I didn't, s'elp my God," cried Fladge, with sudden excitement, and beating the palm of his broad brown hand upon the bedstead; "to hear old Spilkins there tell you who did," he shrieked, "for he knows, he knows!"

Miss Brake paled a little at Reuben Fladge's vehemence now, so as a dangerous lunatic's. She was not prepared for this outburst of passion, she might have been even more overpowered by it had it not been for the last words which had escaped the outcast confronting her.

She turned to the bedridden man and leaned over him.

"You know who killed my brother?"

Mr Spilkins was looking at her now. He shifted with his tongue the ping of tobacco into his cheek, and then said, in a feeble treble,

"Yes—I do."

"And that is why you sent for me?"

Peter Spilkins nodded.

"Knowing I have pledged myself to the hunting down of my brother's murderer. Knowing that I shall find him some day, Morris's wife and all the rest of them having failed so miserably. Knowing—"

She stopped at the white, thin lips parted to speak. She would not lose a word, at any moment, which this old man, lying at the point of death, might say to her

"I don't know anything about you—I don't want to know," he piped forth. "It was Fladge told me you were at Skegs Shore. He's been a-watching you a bit; he's followed you from Boston."

"You have been good to me at times," said Fladge, in explanation; "and you're sent me money. And I ou-ued 'ee to come to Spilkins."

"You are uneasy with this awful secret on your conscience," said Hester Brake, turning to the old man again; "it weighs you down at last."

"No, I ain't a bit uneasy," was the slow reply.

"What then?"

"I'm uneasy as to what's to become of me when Master Woodhatch dies, no goes away. I'm a wonderful age, lady," he whined out; "but it hasn't left me very strong at present. I'm eighty nine."

"Eighty-eight," corrected Fladge.

"You're a liar, Fladge; it's eighty-nine."

And then Mr Spilkins calmly and deliberately swore at Reuben for contradicting him until Miss Brake touched one of his folded hands.

"You are too old—too near God's end of it—to blaspheme like this," she said, reprovingly. "You have sent for me to tell me the whole truth."

"If you'll make is worth my while—if you'll pension me like," he said. "So much a week, sent regular, I want, mum. If it comes in the lump, Fladge no none other rascal's sure to steal it, now I can't run after. Now these d——legs—"

"Why have you kept this secret to yourself?" asked Hester Blake; "why for all these years have you been silent, in the name of common honesty?"

"I warn't going to be worried at my time of life."

"There was a reward offered, and you are fond of money," she said.

"Dr Gosswitch said any excitement would kill me; say 'cert's got a flabby faction, he says. And it wasn't bad fun," he added, with a sudden shaking of the shoulders in token of considerable hilarity. "To be a-laying here, a-hearing more than anybody else, and a-keeping it to myself too, as nose and quiet; that's what I liked!"

This was a terrible old man, thought Hester Brake; a wreck from Farm Forlorn indeed, and to whom Farm Forlorn had not done much good, so taught much charity. This was another of the failures John Woodhatch mourned over so secretly, she thought.

"Well, Spilkins, I will pension you," she said, suddenly.

"Nine-telling Master Woodhatch, so I might lose his bit o' money. Not that that's much," he muttered, "it's doled out beastly."

"Not telling Mr Woodhatch till you die," she answered, with a remove. "Will that do?"

"Yes, that will do. I she'a't die yet awhile for all that stupid nee, Fladge, says," he added, maliciously; "he's a soft one, he is. A poor lot, Miss Brake—he mustn't hear a word of it, not he."

"It doesn't matter to me who killed him," said Fladge, restlessly.

"Oh! you're not a bit curious, you ain't," said Peter Spilkins, now quite conversational and lively and wonsed, "but we ain't a-going to trust you. I have often told him old Woodhatch did it, just to aggravate him."

"I knew that was a lie," growled Fladge; "I wasn't likely to take that in."

"There's more'n me has said is, though, and there's some as think it too, though you don't," Mr. Spilkins remarked.

"There's fools," said Fladge, in reply

"You get out sensible people fools," croaked Mr Spilkins; "get clean out o' my house, and outs till the lady comes to you at the top of the level, will you? We've business to arrange, and don't want you."

"All right."

Fladge got off the bedside and, with his hands in his pockets, slouched out bare-headed into the night. Outside the doorway he paused a moment, and then began to run his hardest, as if in pursuit of somebody, coming to a full stop at the bottom of the steps down which Hester Brake had descended some little time since under escort of Greg Dorward. Here he stood and fumed, scratched vigorously at his shock head, and then slouched back toward Mr Spilkins's cottage again, encountering at the door Miss Brake, who clutched his arm until he winced again.

"See me to my chaise, Fladge; I am weaker than I thought," she said. "I have tired myself out. I am ill."

Fladge shut the door to keep the night air from the lungs of Mr Spilkins, and then, with Miss Brake leaning heavily upon his arm, walked with her along the narrow, uneven path, and up the steps to the high-road. She did not speak to her guide, only breathed heavily, and once looked up into his stolid face as though she fancied for an instant he had spoken to her, but all excitement had vanished from Reuben Fladge, and all interest in the object of her visit apparently had ceased. He was dull and silent, oppressed, perhaps, by thoughts of his own which had come to him with the night air—possibly offended even at Mr. Spilkins's utter want of confidence in him.

They went onward to the chaise thus, where the driver was still sleeping peacefully in the summer air with a late dragon-fly buzzing round his nose, and where the knock-kneed pony, with a voracious appetite, was still plucking his hardest on the grass. The moon was rising from the sea, like Venus, and the stars seemed to have grown very large and bright since she had passed there last. The man was aroused, and glad to see the lady whom he had driven from the lodgings near the "Swan"—glad to jump out of the chaise and assist her into it, and then clamber to his own perch and wait commands at go.

At this juncture Fladge came back to himself, took some money which Hester Brake put into his hand, and muttered in a low, deep voice his thanks.

"He is not mad, Fladge, is he?" she asked in a low, excited whisper.

"He's as right as I am," was the confident reply.

"Oh! as you are," said Hester Brake.

"Has he told you?" asked Reuben, eagerly now.

"Yes"

Then the pony was urged into a trot, and away was borne the woman who had bribed Peter Spilkins out of a secret he had kept to himself for five years. She sat very silent and rigid in the basket-chaise, thinking over the revelation of the night; but half-way onward her lodgings she showed she was alive to passing incidents by calling sharply to the driver.

"Stop here. Some one is coming down the road toward us," she said.

The man stopped, and Kitty Vanch advanced swiftly to the side of the chaise, and said,

"Oh! my dear mistress, I was afraid something had happened."

"So there has."

"Not to you—no—"

"No accident. I took advantage of your absence to steal away from home, you see," she said. "Step in and sit by me."

Kitty complied with her request.

"Why were you coming this way?" she asked, clutching hard at the hand of her companion. "Did you think if I were in any danger it would be found in this direction?"

"I thought you might have gone to Farm Forlorn."

"Why?"

"I can hardly say," answered Kitty.

"I have not been to the Farm," said the mistress, "but for a drive into the open country. Is it late?"

"Yes; it is getting very late."

"I shall be glad when we are at home," Hester Brake said, wearily; then, retaining the hold of Kitty's hand as though she found comfort, as strength, so sympathy by contact with it, the two women were driven back to Skegs Shore.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LURKER OF THE FARM.

Miss Bramx and Kitty Vanch arrived at Farm Forlorn in the afternoon of the following day, and received a hearty greeting from the proprietor. They were welcome guests, and John Woodhatch showed they were welcome. He was at the gate to receive them—a tall, handsome, gray-haired man, who doffed his hat as he came down the garden path toward them, and looked "mass host" to the life. There was a bright smile upon his face also, that took some of the natural gravity from it, as though John Woodhatch were even pleased that day—which was true enough, for that matter.

For here was the success of one of his schemes—a long, elaborate plan at which cynics and shepherd had scoffed. Here was a very pleasant and satisfactory end to it—no close upon the end, with everybody working toward it—that he had reason to congratulate himself already on results, he thought.

"After all these years, John," said Miss Brake, as the farmer assisted her to alight from the chaise, "I come as invited guest to Farm Forlorn."

"Is it my fault you have not come earlier, Hester?" he replied.

"Ah! I am not quite sure of that. I have fancied once or twice you were not too anxious I should come," she said, "and with all your kindness to me, not too pressing in your invitations."

"You're a woman of strange fancies, Hester—and," he added, laughing, "you always were, you know."

"Or you have always said so," she replied, looking up just his face with a smile a little forced—a smile that might have hidden pain almost as something he had implied rather than said. "I have been always eccentric in your estimation."

"I don't say that, mind"

"But you think it," she remarked—"just as I think you the most eccentric being I have ever known, and have the courage to say it, too, in your own house."

"Bold woman!" answered John, as he assisted Kitty Vanch to alight. "And see, Kitty, it is with a sharp tongue your mistress attacks me on the threshold of home"

"She will allow no one else to attack you, sir," answered Kitty; "for that I can answer"

"Ah! 'tis well to have a champion," said John, leading the way now with Miss Brake upon his arm—"a friend who will fight for our good names, for our credit's sake, where our backs are turned. They are the best of friends, after all"

"Where is the lover?" asked Miss Brake, suddenly and irrelevantly

"On his way as fast as a good horse can bear him to his lady love," said John Woodhatch in reply "I thought he would get to Heathorpe and back before your arrival. He will be sorry you have forestalled him."

"Have we come too soon, then?" asked Miss Brake, at this.

"No, my lovely young woman, you have not," answered the farmer, laughing; "but you said about five o'clock, if my memory serves me correctly, and it is now striking four"

"So I am better than my word."

"Yes, and all the better for that," was the dry response.

This half pleasant banter, indicative of the good feeling existing between Miss Brake and John Woodhatch, lasted the remainder of the way at the farm parlor, which was bright with flowers that breathed a second welcome to them. And standing at the table in a neat brown merino dress, new for the occasion, and as do honor as the new faces which were coming to Skegs Shore, was Mrs Chadderton, her left hand busy with her snow white apron, and rolling it up at one corner very nervously, for all the rigid attitude she had assumed.

"This is another friend who fights toy battles too, Miss Brake, and of whom you have heard me speak very often; the faithful and true housekeeper of my poor establishment—Mrs. Chadderton."

"Yes, I have heard of Mrs. Chadderton," said Miss Brake, with a distant bow, and taking on corner of a hand half-timidly held toward her by way of friendly greeting. "I hope our intrusion will not trouble you too much?"

"It will not trouble me at all, madam."

Mrs. Chadderton looked at Miss Brake for the first time, and with a stern, grave expression, which might have signified anything, from grim respect to grim defiance. But this was generally Mrs Chadderton's way; she never smiled, and was not cheerful company It is doubtful if many people in and around Farm Forlorn, with the exception of John Woodhatch, had been struck by the good qualities of Mrs Chadderton, and it was certain Hester Brake was not impressed by her, or by the master's flourish of trumpets over her virtues.

"Kitty will have heard of you too, Mrs. Chadderton," said Mr Woodhatch, not noticing, or affecting not to notice, the frigid greeting between the two; "and you have heard of Kitty Vanch?"

"Oh yes," said Mrs. Chadderton.

And on this occasion the position was reversed, and it was the housekeeper, erect and stiff, who failed to recognize a little hand which was readily extended toward her, and as quickly drawn back again when no sign of reciprocity of feeling was evident.

"Are there any commands?" asked Mrs Chadderton of Mr. Woodhatch, after this formal reception of the visitors.

"You will show my friends to their rooms, please," said John Woodhatch, almost with a frown at her, one might have thought, and as if in reproof for her demeanor, "and then I dare say an early cup of tea will not be objected to."

"Very well, sir."

Miss Brake, however, sat down in an easy-chair by the open window, and quickly took her bonnet from her head and disengaged a mantle from her shoulders.

"May I feel that this is home, John?" she inquired, "and be unceremonious and at my ease?"

"I dislike ceremony always," said John, "and this is home to you, or I am disappointed."

"I am too tired to go any further," she said; "let me rest here till the evening, please."

"Yes, and as you please."

She held out her bonnet and mantle to Kitty; she could not or would not see Mrs. Chadderton's movement toward the articles, and then she lay back in her chair, sighed, and closed her eyes. She opened them again widely, though, when the housekeeper said, "If you will follow me, Miss Vanch, I will show you to your room," and until the housekeeper and her companion had departed kept her gaze upon them both. When the door was shut behind them she closed her eyes once more, and put one thin hand suddenly upon the bosom of her dress.

"You are unwell to-day," said Woodhatch.

"I do not feel very strong," she murmured; "but then I am like a child in strength. A little always distresses me."

"What has distressed you since I saw you last?" asked the farmer.

"I don't know. I hardly know," she added, as one who would not wholly commit herself to a false statement, and yet was unwilling to offer an explanation to her interlocutor. "The day is very warm and coming here seems very strange to me."

"Shall I leave you? A little sleep—"

"No, don't leave me directly," she said; "I want to speak to you before they come back. A few words, if you will."

"Certainly."

John Woodhatch drew a chair to the window also, and sat down facing her. She was a fragile woman without her out-door apparel; the folds of her mantle had disguised her extraordinary thinness, on the bonnet, or its trimmings, had given "tone" to the swarthy-skinned, wasted little face, in which two dark eyes were gleaming. Now in her in-door costume, and sitting there with her walking-cane clutched in one transparent hand, she looked ill and weakly enough—one who required great care to make her way in life even as an invalid.

"So that is Mrs. Chadderton?" she said to John Woodhatch.

"Yes, that's she."

"I can't say I admire your choice of housekeeper," she added.

"You don't like her?"

"No, I don't like her," was the slow, thoughtful reply.

"I am not surprised at it, Hester," he said, lightly, "for you do not take to strangers quickly, and your first impressions are sometimes deceptive."

"I should not like her if she were to live till doomsday," remarked Miss Brake. "What a cold, hard face it is!"

"Here has been a cold, hard life."

"Ah, yes, as has been many a poor woman's," answered Hester Brake; "but one need not look like that. Can you trust her?"

"I have trusted her many years."

"Don't trust her any longer, rather take my warning, and beware of her," she said, in a hasty whisper.

John Woodhatch regarded his visitor with close attention for an instant, then he shrugged his shoulders, got up from his chair, and laughed again.

"You are the most uncharitable person I ever met, with any claim to Christian charity," he said, ironically, "but then you do not always mean what you say, Hester Brake, and so I forgive your hard words."

"I have not asked your forgiveness," she said, abruptly, "and I am not compelled to admire Mrs. Chadderton because you do, John."

"Certainly not."

"Morris never cared for her."

"Very likely, poor fellow."

"He said she was always watching him," continued Hester.

"She was a watchful woman at all times. Why do you quote Morris?" he asked.

"Coming to this house brings back my thoughts of him," she replied.

"Well, you must not be hard or unjust to her because he was," said Woodhatch; "and I want you to take my word that Mrs. Chadderton is a worthy soul."

"You think well of everybody," she said, petulantly, "you are no different from me"

John Woodhatch moved slowly toward the open French window. "What fine harvest weather this is?" he said. "I must look after my corn now, I shall not be very long away."

"One moment more. Whom have I misunderstood—not taken to at first?" she asked, reverting to his former insinuation, as though she set more by his words, or they affected her by their injustice, and were not easily forgotten.

"Lucy Brake," he answered.

"She told you so?"

"Yes."

"She is mistaken. I like her"

"That's well," said John Woodhatch, brightening; "that is how it should be, for the sake of Morris, who loved her very much."

"It is you who are quoting Morris to me now. How is it he is in our minds so much to-day?" she asked. "Is it the vast here, the cool seclusion—can he left this house one night to his death?"

"Try and rest for a few minutes," he said, evasively. "I spoke of Morris because you did. I was unwise."

"I will try and rest, then. I am detaining you."

"If you require anything, touch that bell," said Mr Woodhatch; and he passed out of the window and along the garden ground by way of a short-cut to his fields.

Miss Brake looked round, as if for the bell he had indicated, looked very closely at the furniture of the room once, the pictures and prints upon the wall, the old stone-china on the mantelpiece, the Broadwood Grand, which had remained untouched since Lucy Brake was there last—nearly five years ago—and after the critical inspection she lay back on her chair, a languid, sad faced woman, to whom life itself seemed a burden to bear

The house was very still after the departure of John Woodhatch, and she was very tired with her journey. Yesterday there had been great excitement for her, and she had left "safe as a house and staring" all the long night afterward, and in the peace and rest of her own home she could close her eyes and fall asleep. It was far from a peaceful slumber, however, and disturbed even in that bright daytime by strange dreams, if one could judge by a lax meaning, as of pain.

A heavy sleep, most illustrating all this, and from which the opening of the door did not in any way arouse her. Mrs. Chadderton and Kitty Vanch had come into the room together—the former full of attention, despite her stolidity of demeanor, and anxious that the younger visitor should reach the farm parlor again without losing her way along the corridor.

"She is asleep," said Kitty, at first glance of her anxieties. "You will not make any noise, please," she added to Mrs. Chadderton; "she has had a very bad night."

"I will take the keys from the cupboard yonder, and go," replied the housekeeper; and having been adjured to caution, she went across the room in as perfectly noiseless a fashion that Kitty marvelled at the process, as she herself crept to a vacant chair opposite Miss Brake.

But Mrs Chadderton did not go after she had examined the keys and locked the cupboard—lest her visitors should make free with the contents, perhaps—on the contrary, she came to the back of Kitty's chair in the same ghost gliding fashion, and touched her gently on the shoulder.

"Is she ill?" she asked, on a low voice.

"No; she is only tired."

"She looks like one at death's door," Mrs Chadderton added. "You should be careful of her, Miss Vanch"

"I hope I am."

"One cares always for what one loves; and you love her very much, I am told."

"Who told you?" she whispered back.

"Mr. Woodhatch has often spoken of her care for you, and of how much you love her in return," she replied.

"Has he? Yes, I love her very much," said Kitty; "she has been everything to me for the last five years of my life, and so God bless her for it."

"And bless her for it," echoed Mrs Chadderton; and as Kitty looked toward her, she added, "Yes, you ought to say that, I think. What would you have been without her?"

Kitty stared now at the housekeeper, and felt her heart sink cruelly at these words

"Don't mind me, miss," said the housekeeper, "and don't tell Mr Woodhatch what I have said it is a rule here to look away from the past, having lived down"

"And your past, then?" asked Kitty, wonderingly

"Was in Bolter's Rents along with all the rest of them," she said. "Do you imagine me very much worse than Miss Vanch?"

"Heaven forbid! Why should I?" asked Kitty.

I thought too would not, but I thought I should like to tell you this before any one else did, but she, trembling in Miss Brake, "or Grey coy forward should set you against me"

"Neither will try to do that," said Kitty, perhaps a little too confidently, "on the contrary, you seemed to despise me—to shrink away from me when I first saw you."

"I was ashamed, or flurried—I don't know which. I—"

"Hush! not so loud; you have awakened her. See!"

But Mrs. Chadderton did not stop to see, but went very swiftly from the room, as if afraid or pressed to meet Miss Brake's gaze, which, the instant after the door had closed, was fixed upon Kate Vanch.

"Have I been asleep?" she asked. "I did not hear you come in."

"You have been sound asleep," said Kitty.

"Who has just left the room—Mr Dorward?"

"Mrs. Chadderton."

"Where is she now?"

"She has just left me"

"Come here and listen, Kate," said Miss Brake, with evident excitement.

Kate Vanch crossed to her side, and bent down her head to listen, as commanded.

"I am here to watch her, I have brought you to watch her too, and gain in some way—in any way—if possible, her confidence."

"But yours on most is hers—"

"Yes, yes, I know I was not prepared," answered Miss Brake, hurriedly. "She will take to you power by, but you must be always on guard me, Kate; but she deserves you in your turn. A terrible woman, I am sure."

"I hope not. I think not."

"It is not to be all love-making at Farm Parlors, remember," said Hester Brake, scornfully; "we are in the house whence Morris was spirited away, and where his death was planned."

"Pray do not think of this, Miss Hester—not on this hour."

"This must always be to me a house of shadow," she replied, "and I have always avoided it. But he brings me to it at last."

"John Woodhatch?"

"No. Morris."

"Oh, Miss Hester! Miss Hester!" entreated Kitty, "you will not breed on this again—not now, when there is a prospect of happiness for me. Is it fair?"

Hester Brake rested her thin hand on the soft dark braids of hair inclined toward her.

"Youth is selfish, and love is more selfish than youth—and I have endured both. Kitty, oh, so long!" she murmured. "There, I will not worry you again yet awhile. I only wished to warn you."

"Of Mrs. Chadderton?"

"Yes. She knows who killed my brother?"

A VERSE.

The summer's lovely rose
Much beauty brings, and yet
In coming wakes a tender thought
Of spring's dead violet;
And never a happy song
In sweetest music set
Recalls, whene'er we hear it sung,
What we would fain forget;
And brightest smiles oft shine
Through eyes with tears still wet—
For there is seldom a joy in life
Unmingled with regret.

WINTER SCENES IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE sketches from the pencil of Mr. GRAHAM printed on page 4 present a strong and interesting contrast to the Southern scenes on the opposite page. The former were made on the northern shore of Lake Superior, and convey in a graphic manner a truthful impression of winter life in that region.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

CHRISTMAS-DAY in New York city in 1882 was noteworthy for the abundance of evergreens displayed, and for the very poor show they made. If the streets and sidewalks had been covered with snow instead of presenting an almost monotonous appearance, if snow blown from the roofs of houses and sifting down upon the projections had embossed their fronts with white; if the lawns in the parks had been buried under snow, and the branches of trees laden with it; if the jingle of sleigh-bells had been heard in the streets—then the unusual abundance of evergreens would have made a pretty contrast with the white, and would have given to the city a very bright appearance.

From observations of the great comet of 1882 Professor Peters, of the National Observatory at Washington, concludes that its orbit is a very lengthened ellipse, which carries it outward from the sun about ninety times as far as the earth is distant from that luminary. Its period, he calculates, is about 763½ years, and he thinks the comet may be identical with the bright celestial wanderer which was seen 871 years before the Christian era, and again in the year 882. Since the danger of its falling into the sun on this trip, and heading a blaze had enough to destroy the earth in past time of those now living need forever trouble in view of its return.

Optimists declare that they can in the holiday season overlook the decline of the tin horn as a device put in the mouths of urchins to enable them to express that feeling of peace and good-will which should reign in the hearts of all. The juvenile tin horn is an abomination against which no lover of law and order will ever cease to cry out.

The number of cats employed is not stated. Their duty is to prevent mice and rats from destroying the mails.

The announcement of a new journal, to be edited and published by the patients in the City Asylum for the Insane, on Ward's Island, and to be styled The Moon, recalls a similar publication that was edited by lunatics in the State Asylum in Utica some thirty years ago. It was issued monthly, and was called The Opal. Its contents ran largely to poetry, a couplet of which has outlived the magazine. It runs:

"Come then to the moth-eat's queen, Flighted, blighted lustre!"

When Red Cloud, the Sioux chief, arrived in Washington recently, the reporters sought to interview him, but the only word they were able to draw from him was the salutation "Hau!" Apparently he is learning the Yankee method of parrying the interrogations of the interviewer.

In Switzerland, when a policeman finds a person violating a city ordinance, such as driving a cab after dark without a lighted lantern, or shaking a rug from a window overlooking a street, the officer serves the offender with a card setting forth the nature of the offense, and adding: "If you acknowledge yourself to have committed the aforesaid breach of police regulations, you are to pay a fine of ——— ——— at the police office on ——— ———. If you deny your guilt, you are hereby summoned to appear on ——— ——— at the tribunal of police, where you will have to answer my charge."

Some of the young gentlemen of New York will be interested at the present time to know that "cousins" is a word of gypsy origin, from cosahnes, meaning fascination by the eye.

In a notice of HARPER'S CHRISTMAS, the London Literary World says that it "keeps up the American reputation for producing 'big things.' This Christmas number is not only the biggest but the best thing that we have seen in connection with illustrated weekly papers. There are some half-dozen or more of full-page engravings, with several smaller pieces, executed with great artistic skill, and printed admirably on fine smooth-faced paper, which it is a pleasure to look at and to handle. . . . We advise everybody who can afford to invest in a little of the Christmas literature, which now pleasantly fill up a few spare half-hours in the holidays, not to omit to get HARPER'S CHRISTMAS."

Late one evening last February I sat on the porch of John Prince's hospitable though modest log house at Fort Basinger, listening to tales of wild frontier life told by my host and his stalwart sons. Fort Basinger is situated on the west bank of the Kissimmee River, in South Florida, and is, in that direction, the most advanced outpost of civilization, there being no settlers between it and the dread Okeechobee, fifty miles to the south, and but half a dozen along the whole course of the Kissimmee River, two hundred and fifty miles to the north. It is now a fort only in name, though during the Seminole war it was the site of a permanent encampment of troops. At present Fort Basinger consists of the log dwelling house and out-buildings owned by John Prince, a cattle man, whose wealth lies in the herds which roam the broad prairies of South Florida.

Suddenly, as we talked, the light of a camp fire streamed across the waters of the river a quarter of a mile below the house, and curiosity impelled us to visit the new comers and inquire concerning them. On reaching the fire we found but one man stretched at length beside it, and patiently watching the roasting of a wild turkey that he had shot some hours before. He was Frank Lewis, the best known and most successful alligator hunter and guide of South Florida. For nearly twelve years he has made this Floridian wilderness his home, and is intimately acquainted with its most hidden secrets. Clad in hunter's garb, and with hair and beard tawny as a lion's mane, and uncut during his years of sojourn in the wilderness, his personal appearance was as picturesque as it was remarkable.

He was bound for the vicinity of Lake Okeechobee, on an alligator hunt, and readily consented that I should accompany him and share his labors; though he warned me that the trip would be arduous, and not devoid of danger.

We started at daybreak next morning, the hunter in a stanch cypress skiff, and I in the light cedar canoe in which I was exploring these southern wilds. All day long we glided down the swift flowing crooked river, through its monotonous ramparts of wide-spread swamps and lagoons of backwater—"dead rivers," they are called—filled with water-lettuce, bonnets, flags, and the terrible razor edged saw-grass, but seeing no trace of human occupancy, not even the palm thatched hut of the wandering Seminole. About five o'clock in the afternoon, or "an hour by sun in the evening," as the crackers express it, we reached a small hammock of cabbage-palms, which we decided to make our camping place and the base of our future operations.

Mosquito Camp.

Fire-Hunting.

After unloading our boats I made the coffee, boiled the bacon, and fried the bacon and dried venison, which formed our staples of food, over a fire of "cabbage roots," or dry leaf stalks from the palm-trees, while Lewis erected the mosquito canopies, each supported by four stout stakes, and prepared our beds of palm leaves. These mosquito canopies are indispensable in South Florida, and form a portion of the outfit of every traveler. They are made of cheese-cloth, are generally six feet long, four wide, and three in height, so that in reality they are airy little tents, and afford excellent protection against the heavy night dews as well as against mosquitoes.

After supper, with pipes alight, and stretched at ease on our blankets, with the fire blazing brightly between us, Lewis and I exchanged anecdotes of hunting adventures, and from him I learned more of alligators and their ways than I had been inspired by an experience of months of hunting in Floridian wilds. I shall never forget one of the stories he told me that night. It was of the tragic death of an acquaintance of his, named G——, on the upper Suwanee River. Told with dramatic [illegible] by the hunter, with the necessary surroundings of that [illegible] the [illegible] of the great bull alligator [illegible] blood-curdling.

It seems that G——, who was a powerful man, weighing one hundred and eighty pounds [illegible], was hunting [illegible] friends, the party being only armed with [illegible]. On this return, as they crossed the river, one proposed that they take a bath. Going a few rods below the bridge to where there was a deep pool, they took their bath, left the water, and were dressing, when G—— declared that he must have one more plunge. He dived from the bank into the deep water, re-appeared on the surface, and suddenly, with a terrific shriek and a desperate struggle, again disappeared. A moment later a huge alligator rose to the surface, holding the man in his awful jaws, and swam leisurely toward the opposite bank of the river. The monster had seized the swimmer by the right arm and the middle of his body, so that he was perfectly helpless. As poor G—— was thus borne across the river he begged in his agony that if his companions could not save, they would shoot him, but with only their shot-guns loaded with bird-shot they were helpless, and were forced to listen to his heart-rending appeals without the ability to render him the slightest service. They did, however, run up to the bridge, cross the river, and run down the other side, prepared to attack the brute with their knives and clubbed guns. He in the mean time had reached the bank, dragged his whole length out upon it, and by there for a minute with lifted head, and holding his victim, still alive and struggling, though horribly crushed and mangled, high in the air. Suddenly alarmed by the approach of the men from the bridge, he turned, and with that quickness of motion so wonderful in them ungainly creatures plunged into the river, and with his doomed victim disappeared beneath the surface to rise no more. When the breathless runners reached the spot a few bubbles floating on the blood-stained water were all that was left to tell of the hideous tragedy just enacted.

By daylight our little camp was astir, and a few minutes later was pervaded by the grateful aroma of boiling coffee and the odor of sizzling bacon. That day was occupied in building a hut, which we thatched with palm leaves, and making other preparations for our week's hunt. At odd times during the day the hunter shot a number of cormorants, and caught a quantity of cat-fish, all of which he threw into the river to attract alligators to the vicinity of our camp. He also carefully cleaned his rifles, a beautiful Winchester and an old muzzle-loading Jaeger, upon which he placed his chief reliance, and overhauled his harpoon, making fast it a new shaft of tough hickory, and testing every inch of the fine Manila line attached to the iron head. This line, by-the-way, would be easily bitten in twain by the 'gator into whose body the harpoon had been driven were it not for an ingenious device of the hunter, who uses for the last six or eight feet of his line a bunch of strong hempen cords, which slip between the teeth of the animal, and baffle all his efforts at parting them. And, last of all, Lewis carefully cleaned and trimmed his bull's-eye lantern; for all our hunting was to be what is known as "fire-hunting," and was to be done at night.

At last the sun set, and almost immediately—for there is little twilight in those latitudes—came the darkness which we needed for our work. We ate our supper leisurely, however, and waited until about eight o'clock, "so as to give all the 'gators a chance to get out and be feeding," said the hunter. By that time it seemed to me as though all the alligators in the river were not only "out," but in the vicinity of our camp; for the cormorant and cat-fish bait had done its work, and it appeared little short of suicidal to venture out on the water in the blackness of the night amongst the monsters that we could hear splashing, grunting, and occasionally bellowing like angry bulls, apparently within a few feet of us, and I confess I felt rather "scary" as I took my seat in the stern-sheets of the skiff, and with paddle in hand prepared to send her forth into their midst; but with Lewis it was a matter of regular business, and he was on collected and matter of fact that I quickly regained confidence. He sat in the bow, rifle in hand, and with the bull's-eye lantern fastened by a leathern thong to his head. As the skiff shot out into the river, under the strokes of my broad bladed paddle, she seemed to follow a golden path made by the narrow gleam of light, which was as bright and sharply defined that the darkness was like black walls on either side.

We went down stream, and I had not taken a dozen strokes before a sharp "hut" from the hunter caused me to cease paddling, and for a few seconds our boat drifted with the current, as noiselessly as an autumn leaf, down the bright water path. The gleam of his rifle barrel as Lewis raised it to his shoulder was followed by the sharp report, and a tremendous splashing in the water just ahead of us. But the bullet had done its work surely, and had crashed into the thick skull, plump between the eyes. The alligator sank; but with the long slender shaft of the harpoon we quickly found him, and the sharp barbed iron was driven deep into his scaly body. A slight effort brought him to the surface, his specific gravity being but little greater than that of water, and in another minute the hunter had dexterously lodged the ungainly carcass in the boat. Within five minutes after the firing of the rifle-shot the harpoon had been detached from the dead body, and we were quietly paddling up stream in search of another. Within an hour ten boat-loads of dead alligators, ten in all, had been killed, secured, and deposited on the little bunch of tussocks, about a quarter of a mile below our camp, that had been selected as our skinning ground. Here we pulled them ashore and piled them in a heap to be operated upon the next day, or after they had become "thoroughly dead," as Lewis said. All this time I had not seen a single alligator until after he had been such a single alligator until after he had been slain, and was very anxious to "claim" a pair of eyes. So after we had piled our 'gators on the tussocks, the bull's-eye was fastened to my head, and with rifle in hand I took my place in the bow of the boat, and Lewis took that I had occupied in the stern. As we pulled out into the stream I moved my head slowly from side to side, as directed by the hunter, and for a few minutes saw nothing save the shining pathway among the dark lily pads. Suddenly there flashed out from the blackness, right ahead, what appeared two lights shining at a great distance from me. They were of a dark lurid red, and glowed like dull coals of fire. I was about to call Lewis's attention to them, and ask what they were, when they moved slightly, and like an electric shock the knowledge flashed across me that a huge 'gator lay directly in our path, not more than twenty feet away, and that he was steadfastly regarding us, without showing the slightest disposition to move. With a "hist" I arrested the progress of the boat, but not until she had drifted so close to the great motionless brute that the end of my rifle barrel almost touched the glowing eyes as I aimed between them and pulled the trigger. The report was followed by such a terrible lashing of the water under our bows that as the boat was swiftly backed from the scene of disturbance the was tossed like a cockle-shell, and I experienced the same sensation as when, years before, I had been forced to sit quietly in the stern-sheets of a boat from which a keen-edged lance had just sent a monster whale into his death flurry.

As we lay beyond the sweep of the terrible tail, watching the death struggle of the huge reptile, Lewis said, disappointingly "That was a bad shot. You fired too quick. You didn't kill him half dead enough." It was very evident that I had not "killed him dead enough"; but his motions were as rapid and the light so uncertain that I had no chance to complete the deadening by another shot, and we were forced to wait patiently until he should become exhausted by his struggles. He did not attempt to move from the place in which we had found him, but circled round and round, now raising his horrid head high into the air, and then lashing the water into a turbid foam with his powerful tail. This state of affairs lasted for ten or fifteen minutes, and then the great reptile sank out of sight, and a few ripples only marked the scene of the recent commotion.

"We can't afford to lose him; he's too big," said the hunter as he picked up his harpoon, and we again exchanged places. A few minutes careful feeling among the bonnet roots, and then the barbed iron was driven downward with the full force of the sinewy arm, and as I banked the boat, Lewis seized his rifle. At the same instant there was a rush through the water, and by the light of the bull's-eye, which still remained on my head, I had a vision of wide-open jaws and gleaming teeth. Just as they were about to close upon me, or so it seemed, there came a shot, a rending of wood, and I found myself struggling in the dark waters of the river, the lantern extinguished, and everything shrouded in deepest blackness. As I stood irresolute in water up to my shoulders, a vigorous stream of the most unique oaths from out of the darkness indicated the presence of the 'gator-hunter. I found that he still held his rifle in his hand, and as his cartridges were protected, our predicament was not so alarming nor our loss as serious as had at first appeared. But we were forced to wait until daylight before attempting the recovery of our boat. We waded to the bank, and found ourselves on the tussocks in company with our victims of the earlier hours of our hunt. Although they were supposed to be dead 'gators, and had been left there as such, several of them showed such unmistakable signs of life as we left the river and crawled out amongst them that they had to be "killed again," as Lewis said. He did not waste ammunition on them, but killed them with his hunting-knife, in each case reaching across the animal, and driving the long knife into the brain just back of the fore-shoulder. The "why" of this method of procedure was so evident that no questions nor explanations were needed, for the instant the alligator felt the knife, he struck so savagely in the direction from which he supposed the blow to have come, with both head and tail, that had the hunter stood on that side he would have received serious if not fatal injury. Having thus effectually quieted our companions in the our enforced lodging-place, we seated ourselves on one of the scaly bodies, and prepared to pass the hours until daylight as comfortably as possible. The tobacco and matches in my water proof pouch proved of inestimable value, and in the glowing bowls of our pipes we found a source of cheerfulness which even our wet garments, made colder and wetter by the damp night breeze, could not extinguish. We also succeeded in relighting the bull's-eye lantern, which was very fortunate, for by its light we discovered and killed a number of venomous water-moccasins which had invaded the tussocks, probably only on speculative visits of inquiry, but possibly with murderous intent. I am not sure, however, that they were not attracted by the light, for in all my six months' experience of camp life in Florida I have never been troubled by snakes, and doubt very much if they will, unprovoked, attack a man. Our light also attracted several alligators, whose curiosity was repaid by bullets, and whose dead bodies we obtained next day. Had it not been for the clouds of mosquitoes that enveloped us, one night with the 'gators would have been comparatively comfortable, but they drove us to the verge of insanity, and the first streaks of dawn were hailed with delight.

As soon as it became sufficiently light for us to pick our way, we succeeded, partly by walking and partly by swimming, in regaining our camp, where our thorough on payment of dry clothes, hot coffee, and a hearty breakfast almost compensated for the discomforts and dangers of the preceding hours. In my canoe we repaired to the scene of our disaster, and found our enemy of the night before floating on his back, his white belly glistening in the sunlight, stone-dead, and still attached to the sunken skiff by the line, of which one end was fast to the harpoon in his body and the other to the bow of the boat. It seems that when he made his final rush at us Lewis had fired a ball down the yawning chasm of his throat, and that in his death agony the alligator had seized the side of the boat, and torn it off from stem to stern. We dragged him up on the tussocks, and measured him, finding him to be within an inch of thirteen feet long. Although during that week we killed one hundred and twenty alligators, no one of them equalled him in size, nor did we have any serious trouble with any other during the hunt.

After eight days' hard work we abandoned our comfortable camp, and with heavily laden boats turned our faces up the river toward Fort Basinger and the civilization which lay beyond.

FRESCOES.*

BY OUIDA.

Lady Hermione Latrobe, Milton, Ernest, Berks, to her Sister, Lady Dorothy Latrobe, The Cloisters, by Chesterfield, Derbyshire:

"My dear Dolly,—There is quite too lovely a creature here, a Roman; Esmee has got him over to do the ball-room. You never saw anything so handsome, he is like a picture. And to think we were in Rome all winter, and never saw him! He is entirely farouche, and by an enrich the score fetching. He locks himself up in the ball-room—he is doing frescoes there; and if we happen to meet him in the woods or anywhere, he bows and runs away. He seems to think us a set of wild animals. I got Esmee to send for him the other evening, but he wouldn't show. It is too tiresome. Tabby says we all are too ready to treat him as if he were a gentleman, but I assure you he looks like one, and artists nowadays go everywhere, and actors too, and at the Duke's, last week, there were two of them, and all they thought about was sausel-dredging down in the bay. It's dull down here, on account of Tabby; she's such a grim old cat; but Esmee's awfully sweet and precious, and I wish you'd come, and Henry flabby, I think, is cunning, and he is always good fun, though he scolds. Last night, as the Roman wouldn't come to us, Esmee had five-o'clock tea taken into the ball room; he couldn't run away, and he was charming, told us such delicious Italian stories, and sang such lovely Italian songs, just, you know, as we heard them sing going by in the moonlight at Naples, four or five of them, with their guitars, don't you remember? And then he sketched us all, and gave us the sketches, and I wished he had wanted to keep mine, but I dare say he can do me from memory. I thought Italians were always so courteous, but he isn't one bit. he says as folly rude things, and Esmee got quite angry; but he has a pretty way of saying them too. He seemed glad when we went away, and I heard him lock the door again while we were still in the corridor. He is to be here a whole year, all he himself in the winter, but minister's a hard way off, Esmee will go to Cannes, and means to have the Gitanos to cruise about in. If she asks me to go with her, I shall

"Your affectionate Hermie."

Lorna Bruce, Milton Ernest, to Don Eveelline Ferraris, Piarmella-supra Subiaco:

"The days go on the same with me, my honored and dear friend. My work progresses as well as the uncertainty of the weather will permit; I have contented myself with six of the cartoons necessary; the remaining twelve are still in a vague, incomplete state. When I shut my eyes I see one little village, its oak and chestnut woods, its crags of gray marble and red porphyry, its stripe of ruins, and narrow ledges of pumpkins, and hence that need such coaxing to grow up on high upon the rocks; I see the bright, brown human maidens with their bronzes bearing under them lined bodices, and the earthen jar balanced on their heads, and my heart with my thoughts flies back to you all, and I would that I were sitting with you in your little porch, under the great plane-trees, with the night coming on, so violet, so silvery, so clear and bright, with the glow worms shining like little stars under the cabbage and pumpkin leaves. If I had only enough to live on, without being a charge to you, never would I have been thoughtless enough to leave our sweet silent Sabine hills.

"I find the luxury of this place grow oppressive to me; these endless carpets, that muffle every sound; these endless servants, who anticipate every simplest wish or act; these interminable meals, which need the appetite of Gargantua; this perpetual panorama of idle people, who are always changing, and yet look to me always the same—for there is such a likeness and sameness in fashion!—of all these I grow sick and impatient. One may look one's self up alone as one will, there is no escaping the influence of the atmosphere of a house. A house has its moral atmosphere as a city has. Then the climate has a great heaviness in it. I feel only half awake; I am not myself without the full sunlight. And these eternal clouds are not grand, as our tempest clouds are; broken through with shafts of light, hurled by the wind, piled one on another in masses like mountain-crests, taking at evening on them, when the storm is spent, a pomp of color, a glory unutterable. No, they are more like great dusky feather beds; indeed, I hear they are called wool-packs by the country people: they merely present a monotonous, uninteresting expanse of vapor and as for a sunset, I have not seen one since I saw Civita Vecchia fade away in the evening glow. You will say I have nostalgia! Of course I have; but that does not prevent me from appreciating the rich and pastoral calm of this country, the strength and courage and good-humor of the people, the cleanliness of their houses, and the excellence of their agriculture. If we could transplant some of these qualities into Italy, in especial the cleanliness, we should truly have a paradise. I am ungrateful to murmur at my exile, for I have that greatest of all blessings, work that is sympathetic and delightful to me.

"After a few attempts at suggestion and interference on the part of my employer, which I rejected more peremptorily than was, perhaps polite or politic, she has left me entirely to my own choice of theme and treatment. I imagine her cousin has written to her that I am an intractable. I have been here three months now: all the time there has been a constant succession of visitors; but those of course do not affect my own life. I have no more to do with them than if I were in the moon. They have, or rather the has, however, made a custom of coming into the ball-room for their six-o'clock tea, whenever they are in the house at that hour, and there have been several rainy afternoons. I can not be cheerful, she is distinctly in her own right. Hearing that I am something of a musician, she has had on Erard placed in the big lace room for my use: I can not, of course, refuse to play to her when she comes. Indeed, I confess these afternoon hours break the monotony of my days, and I find myself stupidly disappointed when they are all out riding or driving, or playing their lawn tennis, which is a boisterous, meaningless game that I do not admire, when I chance to cross their court as I walk in the gardens. She has ceased to complain of the frescoes being slowly executed; I think she begins to take interest in seeing the blank plaster bloom like the rose.

"I have had some charming fair children out of the village as models; but they are only fair; they have no soul in their round blue eyes, and I could only model their little healthy bodies and well fed white limbs: their faces said nothing. Now Italian children have the whole Inferno and Paradise in their wonderful eyes: why is it? They have no soul to them; or at least they will sell one they have for a copper centime to buy salt fish or a tomato. But the look is there, and it is not here. Is it because we have so much tragedy in our blood, in our soil? or is it because the Italian mothers still croon strophes of Tasso and Metastasio over the sleeping babies? The English mothers certainly do not sing snatches of Shakspeare on Herrick over the cradles of these pretty, dance, pink-cheeked creatures.

"I have been translating Tasso, impromptu, into French, to milady and her ladies, it seems poor stuff in Gallic dress, yet something of its spirit and sweetness seems to reach them. As I read to them by one of the great windows of what they call my prison-house, with the green lawns and huge cedars outside, and those lovely women around me, I must look like a story-teller of the Decameron: and I believe that the grim dowager grandmother disapproves of me. She has no power, however, to make the red of her displeasure felt, for milady is her own mistress, and having passed her majority, owes obedience to none. I imagine she was spoiled all her life. She expects impossibilities, and can be both insolent and capricious. Yet I think her nature is good, though so incrusted with the habit of the world that the actual heart in her can seldom beat as it might do.

"There is here, at this moment, a certain Duke of Kingsbyan, who is one of ten multitude of distant cousins, and with whom it is desired by her world in general that she should marry herself. He is a good-natured, amiable young man, whom she calls Vic, and tormente incessantly; he has a certain simple dignity which makes him look manly when the tennis line, but he is not her equal in intelligence, and if she take him it will only be because she wishes to be Duchess of Kingsbyan, and they will both be extremely sorry for the step all their lives long, even if nothing worse ensue. I wish I could set her before you with any sort of distinctness. I inclose another sketch of her, I made it last evening. She had been riding, and got down at the foot of what they call the yew terrace, and I was standing there, as the terrace is just outside the ball-room. She took off the little melon-hat she wore, and leaned against the balustrade, and talked a little while. The redness of sunset was shining beyond the heavy boughs of the yews, it touched her hair with its warmth, and made her eyes look quite soft. I shall make a large picture from the sketch when all this is over, and I am back in Florinella, and ask myself if it be not a dream that ever I painted frescoes in England. I dare say she will have married 'Vic.' by that time, and have begun to break his heart and spoil his temper.

"She and those she calls her house party came to the ball-room last afternoon. I can not always lock out the mistress of it, and was forced to open the door, with some reluctance I confess. There was a quantity of people, male and female. They talked English, of which, of course, I understood nothing. I wished I had had an italian with me to have been able in return them their bad manners in kind. Bad manners seem to me the vice of these English patricians. I threw my cigar away when they entered, but the men, and one or two of the women, smoked the whole time. They had tea brought them, and the men drank the most horrible compound, produced by mixing together brandy and a kind of soda-water, and the women ate an incredible quantity of all kinds of hot cakes, sweet cakes, candied fruits, chocolates, and sugared dainties, and I know that their dinner bell would ring at eight! I wonder that they do not all die of indigestion.

"When they at last remembered my existence, they spoke to me in French. Then I confess a nitty demon of vanity entered into me. I perceived they thought me of no more account than one of my lay figures; and I said to myself, "Leonie Renne, at the Greece and in Paris they have always said you could talk; try now, and son if you can not make these soda-water drinkers look stupid.' So I did try. French seemed to them all the same thing as English, except to a very dull being called Lord Colchester, who has a glass screwed in his eye. I exerted myself to entertain them, and succeeded; soon I had the pleasure to see that the cake-eaters paid no more attention to the soda-water drinkers. I told them stories; I sang them songs, for I had my old lute in the room; I played them a concerto of Schubert, and some of the Mose in Egitto. Then I permitted myself to satirize them, and the only drawback to this diversion was that they were too stupid to be easily stung. Only miladi—my patroness—got angry, and defended her order and their ways of life, which I confess appear to me to be of a silliness and a selfishness that are degrading in view of the immense interests that the world contains. Basta! I had my turn, and used it. They staid till their dressing bell rung, and they no more regarded me as a lay figure. Just before they left me I spoke at some length, in Latin, to a man whom they call Bertie, who appears a scholar and a good cenne di art. He looked surprised, but he answered me in the same tongue. Miladi called out, 'Oh! you must not speak Latin, you know we don't know it!' 'Miladi,' I said to her, 'you know it as well as I know your English.' At that she was a little conscience-stricken and ashamed. "A very good lesson, neatly given,' said the gentleman whom they called Bertie, to me.

"I hope they will not take the habit of having their tea here; it is not good to get angry, and it deprives me of the sunset hours' light, and there is so little light in this country at the best of times! Dear and reverend Father in God, I salute you lovingly!"

Mr Hollyn, Rome, to Lady Charteryx, Milton Ernest:

"I should be only too delighted to come over, as you so kindly propose, but there is not a ghost of a chance of my getting away till September, and I shall hardly get ten days then. You know I am left in charge, and the dear chief won't be back from his stag-hunting till November. It is awfully hot and fearfully dull. I make a scappade to the villas of friends, and sleep very often up at Frascati or Tivoli, or down at Palo at Odescalchi's place, but one can't get out of the burden weight of the intolerable heat unless one goes fairly off up into the mountains, and I can't leave the Chancellerie long enough to do that there are complications, and the Chambers may re-assemble any moment. By-the-way, you have not mentioned either Rome or the Frascese for ages: this strikes me as much more ominous than if you indited me reams in his praise. Have you already wholly destroyed him? Has he taken an overdose of chloral in despair, and been interred under the yews of Milton Ernest? If you do not answer me, I shall write and ask your grandmother. I shall have the truth from her."

Lady Charteryx, Milton Ernest, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome:

"You will have the truth, my dear Harry, from me, though your absurdity scarcely deserves it. Your mess is perfectly well, and the walls are getting covered, in outline, he calls it, for the most part, but it looks very well, and will have a very good effect. The music gallery he proposes to do in graffiti, whatever that may be; but I have obeyed you to the letter, and never interfered with him. He is left entirely to his own devices, he thinks I own seams ungraceful and senseless, as he can't be asked even to join in that. Now and then, once a week perhaps, on visit the ball-room; and then he sings a little, or plays, or reads some Italian poem very nicely. He really does sing very well; I wonder he didn't go on the stage like Capoul. Vic has taken quite a fancy to him, which is droll enough, for they can't say more than six words to each other. You know Vic's Eton French, which ought not be so good, but isn't, and only just lets him understand naughty operettes and order supper at Bignio's. Nobody knew he could ride; but the other day, just as all the horses came round, Souchong (you remember her?) got loose and tore away. He was in the home wood as Souchong dashed through it, and he actually stopped her, mounted her, and after the had torn away with him, literally over bush and brier, for three miles, got her well in hand, and brought her in as quiet as a lamb, just when we all supposed she had broken her back in a ditch."

Mr. Hollyn (on a post-card):

"Charming lady's hack, Souchong; but who was the hero? Surely you knew Vic. could ride?"

Lady Charteryx (on a post-card):

"Who was to suppose an Italian could ride? I thought they were like Frenchmen."

Mr Hollyn (on a post-card):

"Forgive my stupidity; I stand corrected. Correct, in return, your narrow insular prejudices. Italians can ride, but they won't, as a rule, feed their horses. As for Frenchmen—ever been to the Chantilly hunt, or seen 'em go after boars in Ardennes? If in very generous of Vic. to like the dompteur of Souchong."

Lady Charteryx (on a post-card):

"I am afraid the best makes you dream strange things. Souchong isn't the least bit dompte, and is quite as ready to bite her groom and kick her loose box into splinters as ever she was."

Mr. Hollyn (on a post-card):

"Only one word more: Do you mean to go to Cowes as usual—or—not?"

Lady Charteryx (on a post-card):

"Why on earth do you underline such a simple inquiry? No, I do not; because the Glorvue is being recuppered, and I want her in the winter."

Mr. Hollyn (on a post-card):

"Thanks: I could have predicted the answer, for winter will you want the Glorvue's cabin done in graffito? I have just seen the man I ought to have sent for the ball-room: he is sixty-eight, decorated, diploma'd, a 'professeure,' an 'académicien' of a thousand artistic societies, and on am; but if the frescoes would have suffered, at least their designer would not, and I am quite sure he would not have translated Tasso or done Mazeppa on Souchong. But one is always wise too late."

Lady Charteryx (on a post-card):

"I have sent a paragraph to the society papers to inform the world of the distressing fact that the Hon. H Hollyn, as well known, etc. etc., etc., has gone mad in consequence of a severe sunstroke incurred in the discharge of his diplomatic duties in Rome."

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to the Duke of Kingslynn, Milton Ernest:

"Dear Vic.,—You know you have my very best wishes, but what can I do? I never had much influence over her, and at a distance I have none. If I wrote to her urging your desires she would probably be utterly set against you; women are 'little cattle,' and the more 'little' than most. I am quite sure she has great regard for you, and I don't think anybody would be as good a husband for her as yourself, setting altogether aside the tremendous advantages that have made you the hope of Belgravia ever since you left the Eton Eight. You will acquit me of any such snobbish meaning. It is your loyalty of nature, your honesty of purpose, your knowledge of her character, and your own sweet and patient temper which would make of you so good a companion of her life. But if you feel she doesn't care for you, do not give her the chance of making you wretched. Esmée is a woman who if she loved a man might be made anything of by him; but if she have only for you a good-natured, indifferent, friendly regard, there—there, my dear Vic., cut your heart out with a knife now rather than spoil all your glorious future by wedding yourself to eternal disappointment, carking jealousy, and perfectly useless devotion. I have said my say, and you must do as you please. I wish you could tell me one thing: have I done any harm by sending Rosina over to Milton Ernest? I thought she might bother him in his painting, but it never occurred to me that she would notice the man any more than she does the doctor or the curate. To be sure, I underrated the attraction of a perfectly regular profile and eyes of onyx."

The Duke of Kingslynn, Milton Ernest, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome:

"No; I don't think there's anything of that sort with the Italian fellow. He seems wrapped up in his painting. I like him myself. Though he is treen-endously good looking, he is neither a fool nor a flirt. He seems an awfully proud beggar, and keeps out of our way as much as he can. I think he is down on his back; I suppose you know all about him. I should hope she'd as soon think of the groom. I mean to try, despite all you say, though I dare say you are right. She doesn't care much for me, but then if she don't care for anybody else we shall get along. I can't put it to good language, nor look at her as the Italian fellow does when he reads 'em Tasso, but I would do anything in the world for her, and I don't believe there's another woman in the world like her. If she's got any faults I don't see 'em, she may treat me like dirty boots of she likes, I shall love her as long as I live."

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to the Duke of Kingslynn, Milton Ernest:

"The true thing, my dear Vic., but women never care for it, and they do treat it like dirty boots; and I'm afraid they prefer to be treated like dirty boots themselves—odd taste, but they are made so. I have heard much of the acute vision of love; but love has always seemed to me to be as blind as ten thousand bats, and yours is an exception in deed. However, God bless you, dear lad, go in and win if you can."

The Duke of Kingslynn, Milton Ernest, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome (telegraphs).

"I've had my innings and I've made the duck's egg. She won't bear of it for a minute. I shall go and pot elephants. I am now off. Write me as London."

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to the Duke of Kingslynn, Guards Club, London (telegraphs):

"So awfully sorry. Don't go to Africa; you don't want knife-handles. Go to Deuchreich or Glenlochrie, and I will try and run over to you for a week up there."

The Duke of Kingslynn, Guards Club, London, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome (telegraphs):

"Very well. Young birds very strong this year. It's no more the Roman than it's the stable-boy. You are a good fellow, for you don't say 'I told you so.' Come to Glenlochrie."

Lennie Rosso, Milton Ernest, to Don Eccellino Ferraris, Fiorunella-supra Subiaco (arrive):

"I have received room with delight and gratitude, dear Father. I am concerned poor Tessa's son has drawn a bad number; conscription is hard on men, but harder still on women. All the views of Fiorunella is charming to me. When I read your lines I hear the cicala boom, the maize stalks rustle, the chiu hoot; I smell the wild honeysuckle hedges, and the lemon flowers, and the dewy summer dawns; when I go into the conservatories here I think I see walking to the Italian fields at sunrise in mid-June. Miladi is almost alone in the house now; her guests are gone, with the exception of a pretty child called the Lady Hermione, and of course the motely grandmamma. The young Duke has been refused by miladi, so the head gardener tells me, who talks French well, and I have won his heart by suggesting to him your simple cure for his vines, which are afflicted in their best-beaten with what on call crittomania. It is certain the young Duke is gone. He behaved like a true gentleman to me, but he would never have suited miladi, who laughed at him, and plagued him, and plainly thought him a simpleton, which I do not think he was, though he had that awkward manner and clipped, bald speech which seems to characterize these young men of rank so far as I can judge by what I have seen in this house.

"Miladi and the young Hermione still come and have their tea in the hall-room, and they are beginning really to understand something of Tasso. Miladi has a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, but I do not like the way she has been taught to sing: it is too florid and not sufficiently accurate. She lets me correct her with great good-humor, and I teach her to use my old mandoline. These lessons, however, will not last much longer, for she is going away on a round of visits to grand houses; she says there is nothing as tiresome. It seems it is the shooting season in Scotland already, and she is going there first, and she says the men are all out after game the whole day, and stupid as sheep or as stones from fatigue all the evening. These very great people seem to me to create for themselves a very vast number of tiresome duties. They all hate what they are doing, and yet they all continue to do it. If I were one of them I should surprise them by leading my own life.

"Could you post to me that large sketch book full of my illustrations to the 'Purgatorio' which I did when I was quite a youth? Miladi would like to see it. She has been much amused with the poem, which of course I put into decent dress for presentation to a lady. I have been telling her how one passionate still make dramas of these old poems, and play them on our hills, with no scenery save nature's. She is not hard to interest when her fancy is taken; she has mind, too, only it is frittered away. I confess I am touched by the change there has come in her since the repented of wounding me about the dress clothes. She is full of delicacy and courtesy. She can not altogether alter the certain brusquerie of her manner which seems natural to her, but the tempers it. She does not in any way resent home truths that I venture to tell her, and she seems now to be mortified at her own ignorance of artistic and intellectual matters, whereas at first she was proud of it. Her education has evidently been much neglected, though she tells me that from four years old to seventeen she was in the hands of governesses of all nations, and crammed with all manner of science she calls rubbish. At seventeen she went into the world, and all her studies were over. That is five years ago.

"She listens with great pleasure whenever I speak of you, and tell her of your vast attainments, your infinite goodness, and of the home that you have made as dear to me in that little hermitage-like house of yours, with door ofd Marta to scold me if I let the chickens get amongst the flower beds, or the thrushes steal the olives. When shall I see the dear little whitewashed presbytery again?

"I am now painting Hylas drawn down into the water by the nymphs. I have no fit model for Hylas; I must go to my memory of the slender-limbed brown lads plunging in our hill streams for fish. To give the night, too, the beautiful night that mariners love, I must go also to my home memories. The moon seems to me always to dwindle when she rises here. The stars, when they are visible, which in but two nights out of five, seem pale and small. Oh, to see once more Venus burning with her trans-lunar light above the dark brows of Serrate or the moss of the Lemmena!"

THE NEW DECORATIONS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

THE interior of the White House has been of a cold and gloomy aspect, considered by the timid and tentative attempts of successive Presidents' wives to enliven it, until about two months ago, when Mr. LOUIS C. TIFFANY'S society of "Associated Artists" was employed to decorate some of the rooms upon the ground-floor.

As it may be necessary to inform many of our readers, the ground-floor of the White House consists of a vestibule entered from the portico on the northern front, which gives access to a corridor running transversely, that is, the long way of the mansion. The vestibule is 60 by 30 feet, the corridor 80 by 22. The wall separating the two is pierced with three large segment-headed arches occupying the whole length of the vestibule, and filled with doors. The corridor terminates at one end in the great East Room, at the other in the conservatory. Directly across it, from the centre of the vestibule, is the oval Blue Room, at the left of this the Green Room, at the right the Red Room, and at the right of this again, being the southwest corner of the house, the state dining room.

The work done by the artists, with the exception of a new carpet chosen for the great East Room, has been confined to the decoration in colour of the corridor, the Blue Room, the Red Room, and the state dining room, the Green Room having been refurnished last year under the direction of Mrs. GARFIELD. The designs for this later work were furnished and the execution directed by Mr. H. M. LAWRENCE.

Perhaps the most striking and original of the decorations is the screen which fills the arcade between the corridor and the vestibule. This is now a glass mosaic of varying but symmetrical patterns, composed of sheets of opalescent glass incrusted with virtuous jewels of topaz and ruby and amethyst. These are arranged in rectangular patterns in the side arches, while the centre of the central arch is occupied with a great oval composition of mosaic of yet more vivid and luminous colors. There is a quaint suggestion of symbolism in the fiery eagles which surround this, and the rough monogram "U. S." which appears here and there in opalescent glass; but these are quite incidental, and the motive of the work is purely decorative, and aims at a harmonious and sparkling arrangement of rich color. The treatment of the leading, which is convex, and the surface of which is tinted, is everywhere an integral part of the composition. The screen is always well lighted—from without by day, and from within by night—and the "wrong side," which is without interest in ordinary glass work, is here an interesting design in color, although of course the translucency of the material is always necessary to its full effect.

The inner wall of the corridor, opposite this jewelled screen, has been tinted a pale olive, as a suitable background to the historical portraits that hang upon it. Ten niches which occur in it have been gilded, and in place of the statues for which the niches were originally designed, but which have not been supplied, vases of growing plants are to occupy their pedestals. The frieze of this corridor, which is bounded by a belt of open India brass-work standing out from a background of strong colors, is in tones of pale yellow and gold laid in stencilled patterns. The ceiling is divided by bands of color into five compartments, and is decorated in gold and silver and brass work on a field of pale color.

The time-honored names of the Blue Room and the Red Room have furnished the motives for their decoration. They have been left as they were found in all details of form, except that a wooden mantel has been added to the latter, while the white marble mantel of the Blue Room has been inlaid with opalescent tiles framed in silver. The ellipse of the room projects beyond the southern wall of the house, and it is in the projection that the three large windows that light the room occur. The blue of the walls is of a light greenish tint, intermediate to the deep blue of the carpet and the still paler and more silvery tint of the ceiling, produced by the use in oval patterns of very light bluish-gray and silver. The frieze is a band some three feet wide, or rather not a band, for the pale blue and silver of its decoration merges without an emphatic separation into the plain tint of the wall. The curtains and the furniture are of blue silk canvas, a new material in upholstery, and assist the extremely light and bright aspect the artist has endeavored to give it. On each side of the chimney piece, and at corresponding points in the opposite wall, are superb sconces, each a diamond-shaped mosaic of glass jewels, some three feet in diameter, set flat against the wall, from the centre of which radiate the eight arms of a polished brass candelabrum.

The chimney-piece of the Red Room is a monumental piece of wood-work in cherry, stained a deep ammoniaque red. The reeded columns at each end, wound with ribbons, have a somewhat fanciful resemblance to Roman fasces, and a belt of carving crosses under the shelf. Around the hearth is an inlay of tiles in changeful tints of brown and amber and brown-red. Above the mantel, and projecting from the wall, is an oblong mosaic of glass. The wood-work is painted a dark brown. The dado is of a brownish-crimson, and is separated by a slight moulding from the wall field of Pompeiian red. This is an unbroken color, and is separated by another moulding from the richly decorated frieze three feet in width, the tone of which is a lighter and more tawny red. The cornice and the centre-piece of the ceiling are of a golden tint, with stencilled decoration in gold-leaf. The ceiling is profusely decorated in stars, with gold and copper-and-gold color, and there is some suggestion in these of the stars of the flag—a suggestion which is heightened by the suggestion of its stripes in the border of the ceiling.

The state dining room is in tones of yellow, the walls a brownish-yellow, the broad frieze stencilled in three or four colors, of which the constant tint is like that of the wall, but lighter and more positively yellow, and the ceiling is yellower still.

The decoration has taken two months to complete, and has cost about $15,000. It is not opened to public inspection for the first time on New-Year's Day.

AMONG THE MOUNTAINS.

A REMONSTRANCE.

GRAY heavens, gray earth, gray sea, gray sky,
But rifled a'th strange gleams of gold.
Downward all's dark, but far on high
Walk the white angels dear of old.

With faith in God and trust in man,
In patience strong our souls possessed,
Eastward gray ghosts may linger wan,
But golden glories crown the east.

Life's broken urns with moss are clad,
And grass springs greenest over graves:
The shipwrecked sailor reckons, glad,
Not what he lost, but what he saves.

What though one sun be set, his ray
Robes the hill-tops like saints new-born:
His after-glow turns night to day,
And when we wake it will be morn.

WOOD-CARVING.

When the stanch old whalers used to weigh anchor at New Bedford, and, manned by hardy Yankee crews, set sail for a three years' cruise, there was a figure-head at every bow to be washed by the ocean's bounding waves. To this day the "down East" craft cling to the custom of carrying an image at their stems. The Polly Anne will be adorned with a form in wood which is intended to represent a young woman, and the Water Witch will dip in the main a mermaid, with scaly tail and flowing tresses, that stands out under her jib boom. Time was when no vessel sailed the seas without a figure-head. There was not but head old Neptune, a jolly Jack Tar, a siren of the sea, or some other design. Sad to say, the days when abnormally shaped figure heads distinguished sailing craft, from the merchantman to the fishing-smack, have passed. Modern craft, except now and then one built at some New England port, are sent out with carved bows perhaps, but no figure-heads appear. A private yacht, constructed for pleasure, may be supplied with a figure-head, but it will be for too accurate and artistic to suit the sailor, who likes to see things rough-hewn. It was with a melancholy sigh that the captain of an ancient trader deplored the degeneracy of the sea when the abandonment of figure-heads was spoken of. There were cracks—and wide ones too—in the figure on his own ship, and parts were missing, but he vowed that it should stay in its place so long as the trader remained above water. He declared that he would not sail in a ship without a figure-head, and no good sailor would have done so a quarter of a century ago. Above the door of a grog shop down among the shipping on the river front is a figure that must have been cut fully one hundred and fifty years ago. It is the boat of a swarthy Portuguese, and is crude and weather-worn. It did service on a merchantman that has been long dismantled. The tug boats mount eagles on their wheel-houses, but rarely carry figure-heads.

THE PORTUGUESE—OLDEST FIGURE SIGN IN NEW YORK.

A man who whittled as he worked bent over the butt end of a spar in the top loft of a building on South Street the other day. He chopped and chiselled and gouged until it was plain to see that he was fashioning a figure out of the butt end. He said it was to be a mermaid, which was to be fastened to a Massachusetts schooner soon to leave the stocks. A week and a half's work was before the tother. The art of carving wooden figures is well nigh as old as the hills, but so few persons are engaged in it that little is known about it. The figures for the most part are used for cigar signs. Some are employed in clothing houses to show off the latest styles, and customers admire their gilded chassis with them. The most used for figures, no matter what they are put on, is white pine. The butt end of a new spar secures the purest heart, and is generally used. When green the wood cuts much easier than when seasoned, and is less liable to split. While the carving is usually done by eye, chalk or pencil lines are drawn on the log for the general outline. The figure is extended but part of the way down, the main body, is made eight times the length of the head. It is made of one solid block, unless the arm is extended, when a separate piece is put on, so that the grain will run the right way to prevent its breaking off. Regular carvers' tools are used. From a week to a month is required to make a figure, and the cost is from $50 to $250, according to the amount of work on it. A mermaid three and a half feet high costs $100. Eagles are less expensive. The prices for them range from $40 to $75. Figures have been known to last two hundred years, but the average life is twenty-five. If a thick coat of paint is kept on them they will last much longer than if neglected. The paint closes up the cracks, and prevents decay to a great extent. The figures are fastened to vessels' bows with bolts.

There are but four or five places in New York where figures are carved. The carver in the South Street shop said the business had nearly died out. He found plenty to do, however, executing fancy carving on yachts and other craft, and was well paid for it. Carving and scroll-work, he said, had taken the place of figure-heads almost entirely, and no vessel has launched without more or less of this work on it. because they took naturally to the work. Most people have an idea that sailors do the carving, but this is not so. One New York carver developed his ideas and tastes at the Academy of Design. SANTA CLAUS AT THE FIVE POINTS.

A day or two before Christmas the children of the Five Points Mission School were gathered in the chapel at No. 61 Park Street to welcome a veritable Santa Claus. A great brick chimney had been erected to the end of the hall and there were candles burning on the old-fashioned mantel piece, boxes and barrels filled with clothing, toys, and sweetmeats were piled up on either side of the fire-place, and half a dozen great stock-

CIGAR AND TOBACCO SHOP SIGNS—PUTTING ON THE WAR-PAINT.

...ngs hung in the bush. When a faint jingling of sleigh bells was heard, the children all held their breath, and a moment later cries of "Whoa, there!" from the chimney intensified their excitement. Well repaid for all his trouble must the kindly gentleman have felt, unaccustomed as a general for sons and white beard, as he sprang out of the fire-place and beheld the happy smiles on several hundred eager little faces. Wooden guns, tame horses, dolls with blonde wigs and tartatan dresses, boxes of blocks, books, hats, toy monkeys, and everything a boy or girl could wish for on Christmas, rolled out of the bag this bonpa Santa Claus set down upon the floor. Child after child was handed down with toys and candies and pop-corn.

It was interesting to watch how tightly the little girls were clasped by their new owners as they hurried away with their treasures. If one could have followed the children as their little feet went pattering down the steps and out into the rain that stormy night on the way to their protected homes, he might have seen the most cheerful side of this item. But let us hope that the Christmas-tree made a difference, for once at least, and that as they climbed the dismal tenement stairs on their way to miserable garrets, as many of them did, there was a light for them as the last flight, and a fire on the hearth to warm them, and that no drunken father or mother whipped them and burned their pretty toys.

One large dry-goods case full of good things was contributed by the Sunday-school of the Methodist church at Westfield, New Jersey, of which Rev. WARREN HOAGLAND is pastor. There were a number of toys in the box, but for the most part the articles were of a more useful kind, consisting of various articles of warm clothing. One little boy gave his first boots, none the worse for wear, and just the thing for some poor child to whom otherwise would have run barefooted on the streets.

The mission is under the direction of Rev S. I. Vincent. Good use can be made of anything suitable for adults or children, and contributors may be sure of having what they send judiciously distributed.

THE LAST COACH.

The distant bells ring sweet and clear
To chime the requiem of the year—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!
What sound breaks in
With brazen din?
"Mount, mount and ride, good people, go!"—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!

Oh, look and see who rides so fast,
With foaming steeds and trumpet blast—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!
The coach is filled,
Mare might be spilled.
"Nay, mount and ride, both friend and foe"—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!

'Tis New-Year's Eve so on they sweep;
Is this the cheer fond hearts must keep?—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!
With reckless hand,
On, on they speed,
And we must mount as if alone—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!

Ring, ring for riders, pealing bells;
The trumpet homeward pæanye tells—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!
The race is won
When note the sun,
And each is gathered to his own—
Tally-ho! Tally-ho!

THE MEANING OF IT.

It has suddenly been discovered that the road to national prosperity and happiness is the abolition of the taxes on whiskey and tobacco. The discovery has been made simultaneously by certain prominent Republicans and by certain leading Democrats. Everybody has known for a long time that poverty, misery, and vice exist to a greater or less extent in our beloved land. There are men, women, and children who suffer from hunger; and so spite of the high rate of wages, the cost of living is so great that thousands find it difficult to procure the bare necessaries of life. Philanthropists have hitherto been unable to discover any method of rendering everybody happy and contented, but now we learn that free whiskey and free tobacco are all that are needed to bring about an immediate millennium.

If whiskey and tobacco are no longer taxed, the poor serving woman will be able to warm her room with whiskey and clothe herself with tobacco. And the same useful articles will supply the lack of blankets to the houses of day-laborers, and enable the ill-paid miners of Pennsylvania to present their wives with real silk cloaks and to educate their children. Dull people may be unable to see precisely how free whiskey and tobacco are to bring about these things, but there can be no doubt—no one can be assured—that want and misery will either entirely cease or be very greatly lessened the moment whiskey and tobacco are made free. The demand for the abolition of the taxes on these articles rose out here been put forth months by everybody, but if we have to clear up express our unutterable longings we should all like for free whiskey and tobacco. It is free whiskey for the poor and free tobacco for who is overtaxed.

It appeared to be rather odd to many people that Congress should be asked for free whiskey and free tobacco, when it have been hitherto supposed, and that free whiskey and tobacco should be represented as the panacea for all earthly evils. What is also odd is the remarkable coincidence that the statesmen who propose to abolish the whiskey and tobacco taxes are earnest advocates of protection. They point out that the amount of the surplus revenue of the United States is very nearly the same as the amount of revenue derived from taxes on whiskey and tobacco, and they assure us the former to be drawn from this fact is that the whiskey and tobacco taxes are unnecessary, and should therefore be abolished.

But if those taxes are abolished, there will be no surplus revenue, and hence the duties on imports can not be reduced. When wrong headed men who fancy that cheap blankets and cheap steel rails are desirable ask for a reduction in the duties on those articles, they will be met by the answer that the reduction will cause a deficit in the national budget. If the whiskey and tobacco taxes are retained, the import duties can be reduced to the extent of more than a million of dollars annually, and we shall still have a surplus. If they are abolished, no reduction of any consequence of the import duties can be made.

The effort in behalf of free whiskey and free tobacco is simply a trick in the interests of protection. The protectionists perceive that the day is approaching when they will no longer be able to induce people to believe that it is cheaper to pay two dollars for a blanket than to pay one dollar for it, or that the tax on steel rails, which is virtually levied on every road who uses an American railway, benefits any one except the American manufacturer of steel rails. To maintain those duties, in the face of the fact that the annual receipts of the government are vastly in excess of its expenditures, will soon be impossible. To prevent a surplus by remitting the taxes on whiskey and tobacco is therefore a necessity if a tariff for protection is to be retained. Free whiskey and free tobacco mean dear blankets and dear steel rails. When the facts are placed before the people, it will not take them long to decide whether the national revenue should be raised by taxing whiskey and tobacco or by taxing the necessaries of life. W. L. A.

Some Opinions of the Press.

It keeps up the American reputation for producing "big things." This Christmas number is not only the biggest but the best thing that we have seen in connection with illustrated weekly papers. There are some half-dozen or score of full page engravings, with several smaller pieces, executed with great artistic skill, and printed admirably on fine smooth-faced paper, which is a pleasure to look at and to handle. • • • We advise everybody who can afford to invest in a little of the Christmas literature, which may pleasantly fill up a few spare half-hours in the holidays, not to wait to get HARPER'S CHRISTMAS. —Literary World, London.

The pictures are every one capital, and thoroughly worthy of the high reputations of the artists who made them.—N. Y. Times.

It is a monument of beauty.—N. Y. Sun.

A Christmas paper not only worthy of the name, but with which it would be idle to compare anything of the sort ever issued from any press. —N. Y. World.

One of the most creditable productions from an artistic standpoint that has been produced in this country.—N. Y. Herald.

A superb collection of beautiful illustrations and charming stories. The illustrations are chef d'œuvres. • • • A pleasure to the eye and a gratification to cultivated taste.—Commercial Bulletin, Boston.

Adjectives fail, and the most gracious phrases of commendation are unsatisfactory, when one attempts to give anything like an adequate characterization of HARPER'S CHRISTMAS. It is a triumph of art, a treasury of literary riches; the richest beauty, for certainly no more charming combination of the sort has ever been [illegible]—London Traveller.

The number is a wonder to Christmas annuals, both as to literary and pictorial features. • • • It does scant justice to say that every one of the illustrations is worthy a frame, and that on some however small, could possibly be called in question, is only what is showed upon its walls the [illegible] HARPER'S CHRISTMAS.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

It would be difficult to select any part of the work for special commendation when everything is so good.—N. Y. Tribune.

The finest and most artistic Christmas paper ever published.—Lewiston Advocate, N. Y.

Nothing that has yet been published in the shape of holiday literature could possibly be so excellent as this unique production. • • • It is superior every way to any and all the Christmas periodical • • • It is supreme among the periodicals of the world.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

The finest publication of its kind ever issued in Europe or America • • • Get CHRISTMAS, keep it, and hand it down to your grandchildren.—Rochester Times.

It is a most excellent publication, and deserving of all words of praise that can be bestowed upon it. The mammoth size of the pages enabled the artists who were engaged on it to display their skill to the best advantage possible, and the illustrations, therefore, are among the very finest specimens of wood engraving that America has yet produced.—N. Y. Graphic.

Criticism stands disarmed before this beautiful publication. From the first page to the last it is a delight to the eye and to the mind.—The Critic, N. Y.

Its all adds the most ambitious, and at the same time the most successful, of the annual offerings at the shrine of St. Nicholas. • • • The supplementary drawing by Mr Vedder is alone worth the price of the folio.—Philadelphia Press.

It is a superb production.—Hartford Courant.

The most beautiful specimens of artistic drawing, wood-engraving, and printing that have ever been embodied in a "Christmas Number" of any newspaper.—The American Bookseller, N. Y.

Exquisite in its illustration, entertaining in text.—Congregationalist, Boston.

We feel proud to have this splendid work go forth to the world as an example of American art and literature.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

A well-informed correspondent is of opinion that we have seriously misapprehended the CHANDLER MCPHERSON plan of representation in the National Convention. He says that by that plan a district carried by the Republicans at either of the two preceding elections, the Presidential or the Congressional, will be entitled to an additional representative. This, he argues, if a sliding scale at all, is a scale that slides upward, because a district gained at the one election and lost at the other will still have its representative. The double object is to reward the victory and to aid the general purpose of Republican district control. Our correspondent objects to the FORBES plan that it discriminates against the districts lost in the Congressional election and recovered at the following election, of which New Jersey furnishes two illustrations. Moreover, by increasing disproportionately the power of the Senatorial delegations, which are selected by State Conventions, it discriminates against the districts. Our correspondent thinks, also, that the FORBES plan, by radically changing the basis of the Convention and by reducing its numbers, invites opposition.

The argument for the CHANDLER MCPHERSON plan is said by its supporters to be that it diminishes the chances of depriving the Republicans of a Republican district of their proper representation because they happen in one election to be defeated. This view assumes, however, that districts are permanently of a certain party character, and if the other assertion be sound that the Republican vote is generally apathetic at the intermediate Congressional election, the conclusion is obvious that the true Republican strength is shown at the Presidential election. It is certainly as fair to suppose that a district which was anti-Republican at the Presidential election, and so carried by Republicans at an apathetic election, is carried not because it has become really Republican, but because of personal and local reasons, which will disappear at a Presidential election. How could such a district be properly called Republican? On the other hand, if defeat at the intermediate election is to be ascribed to apathy, the argument is stronger for making the Presidential election the basis of representation. The real basis should be the general election since the previous Convention, because by common consent it is at that election that the Republican strength is most accurately shown. To say that the intermediate election may be the basis if it happens, contrary to the general rule, to be carried by the Republicans, is not to argue soundly, but to urge taking advantage of a happy accident.

It must be borne in mind that the question is solely of additional representatives. Both the FORBES and the MCPHERSON plans give every district representation; but the FORBES plan adds a delegate for each Republican in the existing House of Representatives, while the MCPHERSON plan adds one for each Representative in the existing or preceding Congress. It is alleged in support of this plan that if the FORBES scheme should be adopted, New York would lose eight delegates in the next Convention, although it would not be contended that the loss of the eight Congressional districts at the last election indicates that the Republican vote is reduced. But this is too speculative a basis. We agree that the result of the election was a Republican rebuke rather than a Democratic victory, and that there is not a Democratic majority of 194,000 in New York. But we are also very sure that the eight lost districts will not necessarily return Republicans at the next election. That will depend upon several considerations. And if this be so, by what right are they assumed to be Republican? Is it not evident that if the object be to base delegate representation upon the real Republican strength of the districts, as shown during the four years' interval between the Conventions, that basis should not be permitted to "slide" back or forward two years, but be fixed upon the election when every minor local and personal consideration is subordinated to a real party preference, and which represents, therefore, the actual political sentiment of the district? As for the FORBES addition of a delegate at large for each Republican Senator, it is strictly logical. If the district delegation be increased by a Republican Representative, a by not the State delegation by a Republican Senator? If this be thought to threaten district ascendency, the remedy is to abolish delegation at large, which would be an excellent measure, because such a delegation is wholly fanciful. The discussion of this subject is perfectly friendly, and so long as district representation is fully secured, and the decisive voice in the Convention is given to States which will probably cast their electoral vote for the candidate, there will be no dissatisfaction with the decision of the National Committee.

THE PENDLETON BILL PASSED BY CONGRESS.

ONLY those who read the Congressional Record—and they are not a large body—know the tact and skill with which Senator HAWLEY, chairman of the committee upon civil service reform, conducted the reform bill through the debate to the triumphant result. He withstood successfully the mass of vicious and treacherous amendments which were hurled at the bill by its enemies, and the most important addition to it, the section prohibiting political assessments in the public service, is substantially the bill introduced by Senator HAWLEY on the 8th of December, as reported by him on the 11th, and offered by him as an amendment to the PENDLETON bill, and it was unanimously adopted by a vote of fifty Senators. Senator EDMUNDS, from the Judiciary Committee, on the 23d of December, reported a separate bill, which is of the same general purport, and which passed the Senate, and went with the other to the House. The Senator clearly explained the constitutional reason of the limitations of the original HAWLEY amendment as well as of his own bill. Senator HAWLEY has thus led the way in destroying the abuse of official assessments, and the just indignation of the country with offenses of this kind which were revealed last summer has found in his action prompt and effective expression.

In the good work of guarding the PENDLETON bill from serious perversion, and in bringing it to a successful vote, Senator HOAR, an old and tried friend of the measure, was conspicuous, and with him may be fairly mentioned Senators LOGAN and ALLISON among the Republicans, and Senators BAYARD and BUTLER among the Democrats. Senator BAYARD has always taken the soundest position upon the subject, and the views of Senators BUTLER of South Carolina, GEORGE of Mississippi, and JONES of Florida contrasted most favorably with those of Senators BROWN of Georgia, VOORHEES of Indiana, and the Republican INGALLS and PLUMB of Kansas. It was a mistake to strike out the provision of entrance at the lower grade. But the error is not irretrievable, and for the manner in which the bill was brought through without more serious detriment, the country is indebted to Senator HAWLEY and his friends.

As we write comes the news of the immediate passage of the bill by the House, and by the significant and emphatic vote of 155 to 47. Mr. KASSON, in a spirit of patriotism which will be remembered to his honor, reported the bill unchanged, and asked that the vote be taken before the week ended. During the excitement that followed, Mr. COX of New York moved that it be put upon its passage at once. This motion fired the House, and after a few remarks and abortive attempts to amend and delay, the call of the roll began. At half past five on the afternoon of the 4th of January the result of the voting was announced, and the bill had passed by an overwhelming majority. The country is to be congratulated upon this happy event, and good citizens who believe that all abuses are not integral parts of a political system merely because abuses will creep into any system, may take fresh heart. The new law, however effective, will not introduce the millennium, but, honestly enforced and administered, it will be of essential practical service in remedying great and threatening evils; and as its efficiency is proved, the range of its operation will be extended. The especial friends of reform have been represented in Washington throughout the debate upon the bill by Mr. DORMAN B. EATON, a member of the Executive Committee of the New York Association, the chairman of the present Civil Service Commission, and the author of the admirable work upon the English service. No more fitting or accomplished representative for the purpose could have been selected. His ample knowledge and cogent counsel have been of the greatest advantage, and no man has more just reason for pride in the result than Mr. EATON. The bill now goes to the President, and we have no doubt that he will promptly sign it and honestly co-operate in carrying it out in its own spirit. If the whole movement be a mistake, the best way to demonstrate that fact conclusively is to enforce the new method vigorously. In selecting the Commission, which is now limited to three members, the President will probably designate one member each from the Eastern, Western, and Southern parts of the Union, and in that case, in choosing the Southern member, he will doubtless avail himself of the counsel of the conspicuous Congressional supporters of the measure from the Southern States.

THE SENATORIAL ELECTION IN MASSACHUSETTS.

No Senatorial election of the new year will excite so much interest as that in Massachusetts. The election of General BUTLER as Governor was a disagreeable surprise, but it was not a sign of serious political change, because he alone upon the Democratic ticket was elected. If, however, the Republican Legislature of Massachusetts should gratify General BUTLER'S earnest desire by rejecting Senator HOAR, it would be evident that an extraordinary political change had occurred in the State. While Mr. HOAR is in the Senate, Massachusetts has there a most characteristic and able representative, of great experience in public life, of great readiness in debate, of ample accomplishment, of unbending principle, courage, and independence. There is no more conspicuous figure in the Senate than he, no man whose ability is more generally conceded, or whose inflexible honesty is more universally acknowledged. His peculiarities and even his faults are those of his State. He is as distinctively a Massachusetts man as CHARLES SUMNER; and in view of the conditions of influence in a body like the Senate it is not to discredit any justly eminent citizen of Massachusetts to say that there is no one who could fully replace Senator HOAR, because no one unites such sympathy with Massachusetts character and convictions to that ample experience which is so invaluable in legislative life.

The reason, the only reason, indeed, that has been urged for his defeat is that he is a man of yesterday, and does not represent the Massachusetts of to-day. It is said that, without reflection upon his spotless character and life, his intelligence and experience, and his efficient service hitherto, he is in the position of WEBSTER and EVERETT and CHOATE and WINTHROP thirty years ago. They were men of another epoch, of other public issues and sympathies than those of that time, and as their ability and experience were properly set aside for the youth and inexperience of a new man who was yet the representative of the new ideas, so may some such representative now be preferred to Senator HOAR. But granting as we do that the questions of slavery and reconstruction are substantially settled, it is not true that Senator HOAR stands in the same position to the actual issues that the men mentioned stood to the question of thirty years ago. There was then one supreme and absorbing subject. Every public man was tested by his attitude toward slavery, and Massachusetts led the antislavery sentiment of the country. Yet even then that sentiment alone could not have elected CHARLES SUMNER in 1851. He was chosen by a coalition of the Free-Soilers and Democrats, and at a time when the Democratic party was practically proslavery. Massachusetts had ceased to be Whig because the Free Soilers together with the Democrats were a majority. Mr. WINTHROP as a Whig did not represent Massachusetts. But how is it with Mr. HOAR? Massachusetts is still Republican, and Mr. HOAR is distinctively a Massachusetts Republican. In the Senate he has been always the sturdiest foe of what is known as Conklingism. Is not Republican Massachusetts its foe to-day? In his own State Mr. HOAR is the untiring and shrewd opponent whom Butlerism most hates. Is Butlerism now so dear to Massachusetts that she will sacrifice her Senator to its hostility? Upon the chief issues of the hour Republican Massachusetts leads in demanding civil service reform. In the Senate Mr. HOAR shares with Mr. HAWLEY the honor of leadership in the debate which has just happily resulted in the triumph of reform. Can it be fairly said of such a man as this that he stands toward progress to-day as the old Cotton Whigs stood in 1851?

It is true—and we are sorry for it—that Senator HOAR supported the River and Harbor Bill. But in his candid, elaborate, and forcible defense of his vote he justified it upon the general ground that a policy of national aid to facilitate State intercommunication for trade is not an unwise policy. It is akin to his views of the desirability of national aid to education. Is it quite evident that his general view of such a policy—not his support of the particular bill—is not the view of Massachusetts? Would Massachusetts probably condemn a policy of national aid to education and to facilitate inter-State trade and the general commercial and industrial welfare? Senator HOAR favors some form of protective tariff. But are opinions upon this topic, of the nature and degree of protection, of the true principles of revenue reform, so definite and conclusive in Massachusetts that it can be said decisively that he misrepresents the Republican sentiment of the State? It must not be forgotten that many of those who insist that Mr. HOAR has ceased to represent that sentiment were most strenuous in asserting last autumn that Mr. BISHOP was the especial representative in the actual situation. Yet Mr. BISHOP was defeated by the largest majority ever cast against a Republican candidate for Governor in Massachusetts, and was defeated by General BUTLER. It is impossible for reform Republicans in other States to see how Republican Massachusetts would help reform by refusing to re-elect Senator HOAR. Alone in the Senate his eloquent voice, seven years ago, reproved Republican recreancy to Republican principles and traditions, and recalled the party and the country to the ancient and honorable way to which they have returned, and upon which at this very moment he is a leader. Shall this be also the moment, when he has just given his powerful aid in the Senate to the triumph of civil service reform, when he still stands, as he has always stood, instinctively loyal to Massachusetts principles, a thorough Massachusetts man in conviction, character, and accomplishment, and a true and tried public servant, that Massachusetts declares him to be no longer her fitting representative?

THE POLITICAL NEW YEAR.

THE improved political feeling of the country was shown at the opening of the New York Legislature, when each of the two great parties put forward a young and conspicuous reformer as candidate for Speaker. The Democrat, Mr. CHAPIN, who was elected, is a gentleman who at the last session sustained many a good cause in concert with the honorary Republican candidate, Mr. THEODORE ROOSEVELT, one of the youngest and most independent of the representatives of his party. It is evident that the significance of the elections has not been lost, and that both parties will rely less upon machine management than upon public approval and confidence for success in 1884.

Governor CORNELL retires with universal commendation, except from jobbers whose schemes he has baffled, and from the machine of his own party, which nominated him but could not use him. We say it with the more pleasure because we opposed his election, when nominated, for reasons which have been recently ratified by a majority of nearly two hundred thousand. It will not be forgotten that Governor CORNELL withstood the most powerful and specious temptation to misuse his official authority in a way which would not necessarily have justified a charge of corruption, and which would have gratified his cherished ambition.

Governor CLEVELAND, to whom the circumstances of his election have given extraordinary prominence, begins his official career with singular soundness. His message is a plain survey of the great interests of the State, in which his recommendations in regard to the canals show a firm grasp of the subject, while his remarks upon taxation indicate want of familiarity with the soundest views. That taxation should be in a just sense impartial is undeniable. But it is tolerably clear that to equalize them most fairly a very different policy from that recommended by the Governor is indispensable. With this exception the specific recommendations of the Message are excellent. But many suggestions which might have been expected are wanting. There is a certain timidity of treatment, which will doubtless disappear as the Governor becomes more accustomed to his position, and no Governor of New York has ever entered upon his office with greater certainty of candid consideration from his political opponents than Governor CLEVELAND.

THE EFFORT TO SAVE NIAGARA.

THE preservation of the Falls of Niagara as a sublime natural spectacle is rapidly becoming a pressing question, and we are glad to know that energetic steps have been taken by well known and efficient citizens to procure legislative action upon the subject. The immediate vicinity of the cataract is being rapidly ruined by every kind of disfigurement, so that there is now not a foot of American soil from which the Falls can be seen without payment. Thus the mere spectacle of the falling water, shorn of its natural frame-work, has become a luxury, from which the poor are debarred. This is properly held to be a public wrong, and the time has fully arrived for the State of New York to save Niagara, unless it means to allow the grandeur and beauty of the great spectacle to be practically obliterated.

The objection that the proposition to prevent this untoward result is a mere sentimental project, and that the greatest water-power upon the continent can not be sacrificed to romantic whims, is easily disposed of. There is no suggestion that the advantages of the great water-power shall be lost. The character of the banks of the Niagara River is such, their line so curves, that the whole industrial value of the power can be saved without impairing the natural beauty of the scene. The busy factories can hum and spin, and distribute their various products all over the world, while from all the world pilgrims may throng to the unimpeded enjoyment of the sublimity of Niagara. It would be a disgrace to the imperial State, and a national shame, if the practical destruction of a scene of such lofty and solemn and universal delight should be permitted. To the guardianship of New York nature has intrusted a spectacle unparalleled in the world. It would be a new reproach to the name of republic if in this new way the State should prove unfaithful. The imperial State which fitly counts Niagara among its proudest possessions should certainly justify its pride by properly cherishing the treasure. If an English county should tolerate the wanton or trading desecration of a noble cathedral, it would be branded with an evil name. If New York should permit a desecration which is virtually the destruction of Niagara, it would have lost its imperial spirit and renown.

Three years ago a special report of the Commissioners of the State Survey presented this subject in the most forcible and reasonable manner. The general proposition was that of a public park, to include the shores bordering upon the cataract and rapids, to be maintained for public use forever. The area contemplated included the islands above the Falls and a strip of the bank beginning at the head of the rapids and extending to the upper suspension-bridge. The breadth of the strip is determined by a natural terrace which is generally about a hundred feet from the water's edge, but happily widening around the Falls, so that ample space would be obtained. Mr. OLMSTED, who with Mr. GARDNER has carefully considered the subject, proposes that the work of preparation should not be landscape ornamentation, but simply the removal of unnecessary and disfiguring artificial objects. This would seclude the Falls, and leave them in their natural grandeur, free from the intrusion of shops, booths, refreshment saloons, exhibitions, and every form of nuisance and disturbance. The report adds that the pecuniary loss to the people of the State from the destruction of the Falls as a place of resort, which is now imminent, would be much greater than the outlay required to carry out the scheme proposed. Petitions are now in circulation asking the Legislature to take action for the preservation of Niagara, an object which not only every intelligent New-Yorker, but every American citizen, must earnestly desire to see accomplished.

PEN AND LUTE.

THERE was a time when the name of RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, a younger brother of N. P. WILLIS, was familiar to many readers as that of a student of music who had lately returned from Germany an accomplished musical scholar. He became the editor of a journal of music in New York, in which the musical events and persons of the time were gracefully and intelligently discussed. But to a circle of private friends he was still better known by his delightful musical gifts, his exquisite taste giving to his delicate singing of his own verses, set often to melodies of his own, a singular charm. The changes of life carried Mr. WILLIS to Detroit several years since, and a Detroit publisher has just issued a small slender quarto, beautifully printed and flexibly bound, containing earlier and later verses by Mr. WILLIS. It is a tasteful and neat volume, and the verses are marked by the tender pathos and airy grace which characterized the poet's singing in other years.

MR. EVARTS AT NEWBURGH.

THE selection of Mr. EVARTS as the orator at Newburgh upon occasion of the celebration which closes the epoch of Revolutionary centenaries has been received with universal commendation. Orator, statesman, and scholar, he has all the accomplishments which the great commemoration demands, and on one of the most eminent citizens of the State, he is well chosen to speak the last centenary word for New York in the Revolution. The occasion, the theme, and the orator promise a memorable day. New York, indeed, is reproached with indifference to her own glory and a lack of just pride in her own annals. But her main root was transplanted from Holland, the soil from which English and New-English greatness grew, and her apparent apathy may be viewed as only one aspect of that dissolute fin de siècle excitement which has become synonymous with the English name. The theme of the Newburgh celebration is great, and the orator will do eloquent justice to it.

GAMBETTA.

IN another part of this paper the reader will find a careful estimate of the character and career of the most conspicuous of recent Frenchmen. Of the three most prominent public figures in contemporary Europe GAMBETTA was the most picturesque, and his single life was as important as his. Neither the death of GLADSTONE nor of BISMARCK would shake England or Germany with such doubt as that of GAMBETTA shakes France.

This is far from saying that he was essentially as great a man as either of these. GLADSTONE and BISMARCK belong in a large sense to the class of builders of states, while GAMBETTA was intrinsically a revolutionary figure. He belongs with DANTON and MIRABEAU and RIENZI rather than with PYM and CROMWELL, and our own WASHINGTON and HAMILTON and MADISON. But his force of will and his oratorical power gave him a popular ascendency such as no other modern Frenchman has achieved. LAMARTINE'S influence in 1848, although honorably exercised—and to be always honorably remembered, because LAMARTINE more than any of the leaders of '48 prevented at the outset the lapse of that movement into a red republic—was thin and tepid compared with the passionate mastery of revolutionary France by GAMBETTA. Himself what is finally called a child of the people, he spoke for the instincts of the people, and touched its heart with electric sympathy.

But if any one should be disposed to argue from the stormy and irregular life of GAMBETTA that moral strength and loyalty to principle and purity of well-ordered life are not essential to great political leadership and statesmanship, he has but to look from the dead Frenchman, exhausted at forty-four, to the greatest of living Englishmen at seventy-three guiding with increasing wisdom and undiminished power the political destiny of his country.

PERSONAL.

THE exquisite design on the first page cover of HARPER'S CHRISTMAS, representing the shadow of a woman's face on the moon, has been greatly admired by every person of taste. It was from the pencil of ELIHU VEDDER, one of the most imaginative of living artists.

—While the brilliant and fascinating society novel A Transplanted Rose was in course of anonymous publication in HARPER'S BAZAR, the public was on the qui vive to discover the author's name. From the intimate acquaintance displayed with the most exclusive circles of New York society it was evident that the writer was not an outside observer, and that the solution of the mystery must be sought within those charmed and narrow limits. As many ingenious but inaccurate guesses at the author's name have been made, we take pleasure in saying that the public is indebted to Mrs. M. E. W. SHERWOOD for this fresh and vigorous story of fashionable New York society.

—Mr. W. J. ARNELL is making arrangements for opening an American Art Gallery at Mount McGregor, near Saratoga Springs, next summer. The number of paintings exhibited will be limited to 150, and none but works by native artists will be admitted.

—The new President of Girard College, Professor PEPPMULLER, is a native of Pennsylvania, and forty-eight years of age. He began his career as a professor of English literature and mathematics in the Freeland Seminary, at his home, of which he became principal in 1867, and so continued for five years. He was then elected principal of the Andalusia Seminary, under the care of the P. E. Church in Bucks County, and remained there until his election four years ago as successor to the then Vice-President of Girard College, HENRY W. ARMIT.

—It is rumored in Washington that the Hon. RANDALL L. GIBSON, U. S. Senator-elect from Louisiana, will resign that position to become president of the educational institution in New Orleans which has been so munificently endowed by Mr. PAUL TULANE, of Princeton, New Jersey.

—"There was a tide," etc., which, "if taken at the Flood," etc., leads to pleasant results. This was the case last Christmas-day, when Mr. J. C. FLOOD, the Bonanza potentate, divided $6000 among charitable associations in San Francisco, treating Protestants, Catholics, and Hebrews alike.

—General LEW WALLACE, United States Minister to Turkey, is one of the most scholarly as well as one of the most practical men in our diplomatic service. He has just been making a tour to Syria and the Holy Land, and his reception at Jerusalem was "a full-sized" event. All the Americans in the city came out to meet him at the Joppa Gate. The Star-spangled Banner was carried by the Jews, and a leading rabbi made an address of welcome, and led the crowd in giving three cheers. General WALLACE jumped down from his horse, thanked the rabbi in appropriate terms, and shook hands all around. Afterward he was given a reception at the consulate. The Sultan had telegraphed orders in advance as to General WALLACE'S lodgings and entertainment by the city officials, which was no unprecedented attention. General WALLACE is a prime personal favorite of the Sultan.

—The seventieth anniversary of the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette has just been celebrated. It was first printed by WILLIAM WARLAND CLAPP in 1813, and subsequently by his son, Colonel WILLIAM W. CLAPP, now of the Boston Journal. The Gazette is now edited and published by Colonel HENRY G. PARKER, and besides being the oldest Sunday paper in the United States, is one of the very best.

—The American fashion of "corners" seems to have spread to England. The demand for HARPER'S CHRISTMAS so far exceeded the supply that the edition was exhausted on the day of publication, and some of the fortunate retailers got double the retail price. The English press has been unanimous in praise of the American novelty.

—When STEPHEN GIRARD died, fifty-two years ago, and left two millions of dollars to found a college for orphan boys, he little thought that his bequest would be so carefully and successfully managed as to be worth, in half a century, over twenty millions, and every year shows a large addition to the endowment fund. Its income to 1882 amounted to $1,022,807 68. The college now contains 1110 pupils, and there are 642 candidates for admission.

—Sir ARCHIBALD ALISON in his recently published autobiography says of Mr. BANCROFT, during his mission to England, that "like all well bred Americans he was simple and unpretending in his manner, and without affecting republican simplicity, his establishment was unostentatious, and made no attempt to vie with the magnificent display at the Russian and Prussian embassies. But nowhere in London at the time was the society more instructive, or the conversation on a higher strain in point of thought or expression. I could not but feel flattered," he modestly remarks, "by the manner in which on all occasions Mr. BANCROFT endeavored to bring me forward." And our Mr. PEABODY pleased him too. "The more I saw of him," says Sir ARCHIBALD, "the more was I struck with his talents and acquirements."

—Writing of Mr. HJALMAR H. BOYESEN, editor of the New York World, a correspondent says that "he is a bachelor, and lives in three rooms in the building of the University of the City of New York. Few visitors enter his room. Their portal has no bell, no knocker, no knob, only a slit for a Yale-lock key, and a larger slit for letters. But they are said to be furnished in a style of barbaric splendor. Trophies of travel hang thick on the walls—rare paintings, china, glass, silver and gold arms and armor. The floors are covered with Oriental rugs and arctic furs. And there are many choice souvenirs, such as an autograph letter from the Shah of Persia, the letter from the Khedive Tewfik giving the city of New York, through Mr. HJALMAR, the famous obelisk, and many other similar tokens of Mr. HJALMAR'S wide acquaintance among the notabilities of foreign lands. He goes to the World office late in the evening, and stays until the very early morning. At other times he communicates with his lieutenants by a private telephone line. He is a very handsome man, a highly cultured scholar, and is a charming companion and brilliant social star."

"LOST"—FROM THE PICTURE BY BLAVIS.

THE OVERFLOW OF THE SEINE.

THIS winter has been rendered memorable in Europe by most disastrous floods. The Danube has even shown its channel and inundated Vienna; the swollen Rhine has brought havoc in the cities which end its banks, the Seine has been in many places transformed into a lake. At Charenton and Alfortville, near the junction of the Seine and the Marne, an immense sea spread before the eyes of the spectator, who could discern in the vast waste of waters here and there merely a tree-top or a roof emerging from the liquid plain. At intervals huge black pipes stood up above the waters—they were the chimneys of factories; while over the surface of the waters—for real names arose—sea birds were skimming, and screaming dolefully to add to the sadness of the scene.

At Villeneuve the water rose so high on the railroad embankment that the wind carried the spray into the faces of the passengers on the train, and compelled precautions to be taken to secure the structure. The trains had to go slowly, and watchmen were placed at intervals to indicate by signal to the engine-drivers when to proceed. At the left of the great line from Paris to Geneva, in front of Villeneuve-St.-Georges, all the lowland was submerged in spite of the high embankment of the Lyons Railroad, and the houses of the market-gardeners were ingulfed. The flood began to diminish on the 15th of December, but even then there presented a sad spectacle of streets turned into canals and traversed by boats. At Ivry there was a general emigration, and over two hundred and fifty fugitives received shelter in the barracks, where relief was furnished to them daily. M. CARNOT, the Prefect of Police, assisted at the distribution of clothing, food, and money to the destitute sufferers. The view of the Seine between Asnières, Puteaux, and Suresnes was lamentable, some idea of treeless abode inhabiting where the islands had been. Everywhere was the same spectacle, "water, water everywhere," bearing down débris of all kinds, and washing round chimneys and trees in a thick muddy torrent. The police and the soldiers of the wagon train were kept busy in rescuing lives and property. At Courbevoie the town drummer was sent round to announce to the inhabitants that a rise of the river was imminent, and that the greatest precautions must be taken. The Bois de Boulogne was equally submerged in the portions adjoining the river, and the house of the keeper was turned into a resemblance of the dwellings of the prehistoric lacustrine population of Switzerland. The spectacle of the inundation, like every other spectacle, attracted crowds to the scene, and from the Place de la Concorde to Bercy every bridge had its throng of spectators. The hydrometric station at the Quai Malaquais was a great centre of interest, and the news of the decline was read eagerly. By the 12th of December this decline was considerable, in the Seine as well as in its tributaries, the Marne, the Aisne, and the Oise. But there was still the same crowd of gazers, and, to accommodate the curious, extra omnibuses ran from the city to Saint-Cloud.

The greater part of the quays have been mined by infiltration, and many places have caved in on the quays Orsay, Malaquais, and Anatelia. The inundation went down as rapidly as it had risen, and some of the workshops and factories imprisoned by the waters began to prepare to resume operations. At forty-two steam pumps were set to work, under the management of the soldiers of the One Hundred and First Regiment, who were relieved every two hours. But certain formalities have to be gone through before the inhabitants can return to their houses. The re-occupation of the damaged dwellings must be authorized by the Commissary of Police, who, assisted by an architect of experience, examines the cellars and foundations to see whether there is any danger of the building falling. Many houses will be uninhabitable without extensive repairs.

On the banks of the Marne similar scenes presented themselves. From the bridge of Joinville the sight was a striking one. The water had penetrated into all the villas; the houses on the banks were surrounded by the flood, some showing only the roof, others entirely flooded, just as they happened to be situated, but all abandoned. At Joinville half of the plain was under water. The majority of the dwellers on the little island not far from the railroad were absolutely imprisoned in the upper stories of their houses, and a special service had to be organized to convey to them the necessaries of life. A small flotilla was created to rescue them if necessary, and gangways into the windows were built. Many distressing scenes, of course, took place. At the barrack on the Boulevard Masséna a family consisting of a husband, wife, and eight children were sheltered; the man had his leg broken, and the rest of the family had neither clothes nor linen.

The efforts of the government and private charity have been active in endeavoring to alleviate the distress the inundation has caused. The press of Paris has, as usual, been foremost in the good work. A committee of six members has been formed to centralize the subscriptions, and to enter into relations with the committees instituted in each commune, in order to distribute relief as speedily as possible. It has been decided, with a view to repair the damages caused by the flood, to give a grand fête and to publish a special number of each journal for the benefit of the sufferers. The present flood, high as it has been, has not attained the height of the floods of 1872 and 1876. We smile at the Neapolitans who continue to build on a volcano: are these any wiser who continue to build in situations exposed to equal danger from another deluge?

MOVING OUT.

LÉON GAMBETTA.

Last current of the men who have been most conspicuous in French history, M. Gambetta was of Italian origin, his father being a Genoese, and his mother belonging the first strain of pure French blood in the family stock. The traces of this Italian origin are very clearly to be seen in the features of the portrait of the dead leader which we publish this week. They were also to be seen still more plainly in his character and speech. He had the fiery impetuosity, the unshrinking courage, and the indomitable will, combined with the aptitude for planning, the subtle personal influence, the sharp wit, and the stinging eloquence, which showed the combination of the nature of Northern Italy with that of Southern France. He birth was humble enough, but he never made so much as has frequently been asserted. His father was a man of considerable means, his mother was an excellent specimen of the French bourgeoise, with a strong mind fairly trained, a warm heart, and a generous sympathy with her son's intellectual tastes and ambitions. Gambetta was born in the little town of Cahors, in the department of the Lot, on the 30th of October, 1838, so that he was just in the prime of life when he was so suddenly and unexpectedly snatched away. He was educated in part at a Jesuit seminary, where the loud priests flattered themselves they could harness his flaming spirit to the car of the Church, but gave it up after they found him declaiming Armand Carrel's Republican articles to his schoolmates. Later he spent months of torture in the Lycée of his town, where his health was seriously impaired, and from there he was taken into his father's storehouse which was greater torture still.

A STREET CROSSING.

At eighteen he ran away, aided by a contribution from his mother's little economies, and ventured on the law course at the Sorbonne, Paris. Before his meagre stock of money was exhausted his father was persuaded to pardon his contumacy, and gave him an allowance to finish his studies, being thereto persuaded in great part by the prayer of the boy's old professor of law, who had been captivated by his pupil's extraordinary talent, and assured the reluctant parent that it would be a crime to deprive the bar of France of such "a magnificent organ." Young Gambetta completed his course and took his degree, and devoted the remaining two years, which he was obliged to wait before he could be called to the bar, to general studies and to his first attempts at journalism. Curiously enough, these were not at all political, but essays in criticism of books, of the theatre, and particularly of art, for which he had always an ardent passion, and which he very thoroughly understood. In his later life, when he had become powerful in the land, among his most intimate friends were Coquelin fils, the actor, Armand

PATRET, and a group of painters, of whom FRANÇOIS MILLET was the chief. Happy student days, in which long hours of patient labor were fringed with careless meetings in the Café Procope, devoted to that wide, varied, quiet, and penetrating conversation of which GAMBETTA was always a master. It has been charged that the morning of his life was clouded by dissipation; but whatever boyish excesses he may have indulged in, "dissipation" was the last thing of which he was capable. On the contrary, concentration was his ruling characteristic, and it was an idler who entered successively the offices of the great criminal lawyer LACHAUD and the almost equally noted business lawyer CRÉMIEUX, who had at that time the largest and most important circle of Israelitish clients in France, if not in Europe. With the latter, GAMBETTA advanced rapidly on the position of chief clerk, and which, as may be imagined, required hard work, exact knowledge, and the closest fidelity to duty.

In the mean time, among his journalistic excitement was one into the heart of inquiring the proceedings of the Corps Législatif—an occupation quite different from our conception of reporting, and including running commentaries on men, measures, and ideas. It was of service to him to his later career. At this time he was already an ardent Republican, and associated himself very early with the movement of "Young France" against the Empire. His first conspicuous appearance in connection with politics was his defense of DELESCLUZE, editor of Le Rappel, who had been prosecuted for opening a subscription for a monument to Baudin, a victim of the coup d'état. This was in 1868. GAMBETTA had just passed his thirtieth birthday. The "magnificent organ" which had alarmed the professor of the Sorbonne was developed by practice, and inspired by the ripened convictions of its possessor. For two hours he held his audience fascinated by his eloquence. His appeal for justice, for liberty of the press and of speech, was enforced by a terrible arraignment of the Empire, its origin, its ideas, purposes, policy, its perils, and its vices. He pictured France bound, gagged, and thrown bleeding at the feet of a vulgar despot, a vain and unscrupulous pretender, and he predicted that when she snapped her bonds and rose to his feet, her oppressor would fall before her. The next spring the Imperialists were amazed to see the young defender of DELESCLUZE returned as once from Paris and Marseilles, at the latter over the heads of their candidate DE LESSEPS, the veteran Orleanist Tuscan, and the conservative Republican and Legitimist candidates. A new element had made itself felt in the politics of the land of official vendettas and fraudulent plébiscites. Entering the national legislature as the most popular leader of the Republicans, GAMBETTA poured the vials of his hot wrath upon the OLLIVIER ministry, by which the frightened and fading Emperor sought to allay the rising storm, and it was unquestionably to the strength of the movement which in fact was due the mad effort of NAPOLEON III. to win back the estranged favor of France by a foreign war. With the war, opposition to the government for a time was suspended; but when the Emperor left the field of Sedan for a German prison, GAMBETTA was one of the Republican leaders who instantly organized the Government of National Defense; he was selected as Minister of the Interior.

THIS was in September, 1870. The next few months were the most eventful in the life of GAMBETTA. He was then less than thirty-two years of age. Though his companions were FAVRE, PINARD, SIMON, and PICARD—veterans of the liberal party—the weight of the work of resistance to the invaders fell upon him. To the duties of his position as Minister of the Interior were joined those of the Ministry of War. As the tidings hastened in the capital, GAMBETTA, rushing above their heads in a balloon, proceeded to Tours, and assumed practically a dictatorship for his work during this momentous period there is no adequate account. That his labors were prodigious is certain. The best army of France was shut up in METZ. The larger part of the remainder was surrendered at Sedan. A considerable force of regulars were within the walls of Paris, and with three was nearly all the artillery and material of war not captured or confined with BAZAINE. To the armies still disposable GAMBETTA added six hundred thousand recruits, badly clothed, poorly armed, insufficiently equipped, it is true, but able to seriously threaten the communications of the Germans, and to hold in check the splendid forces of the victorious Prince KARL. He was foredoomed to failure, but the magnificent effort was of priceless value, for it taught France the lesson that more and could not contend with intelligence, unity, and discipline, and that her humiliation was not due to the Empire alone, nor to any treachery of BAZAINE'S, but to the helplessness bred of his submission to a showy despotism. During this period GAMBETTA'S radical errors were in refusing to call together the people's representatives, and in his attempt, when the Assembly was finally summoned to pass as the terms of peace, to proscribe the principal Imperialists. This was fighting fire with fire, and showed a taint of the dictatorship which seriously marred his future influence.

After the peace GAMBETTA, completely broken in health, repaired to Spain, where he was during the insurrection of the Commune. He was reelected to the Assembly by enormous majorities in nine departments. Returning to Paris, he took his seat as Deputy from the Bas-Rhin, and founded the journal La République Française. His political career since then is familiar to most intelligent readers, and need not be referred to in detail. At first he was looked upon with distrust by THIERS and his advisers, and not without some reason. But a good understanding was gradually established between them, the elder man being content to allow the younger to point the way so long as he himself held the command. GAMBETTA rapidly matured a broad policy. Its first feature was as one among the friends of the Republic, and they gained, the steady pursuit of a permanent republic, the practical development of representative parliamentary institutions, universal free secular education, a strong army, free trade, and commercial progress. The instrumentalities on which he relied were party organization, thorough and constant discussion, and the press. Of all these he was a master. His fatality for politics, as it is understood among us, would have been remarkable even here. His intimate acquaintance with the people, his accurate knowledge of the currents of public opinion, his influence over political leaders, were something quite unknown in France. As an orator he had no equal. His command of a miscellaneous audience was perfect, for either direction or restraint. He had the true of apt and significant phrases; "the new social stratum" (la nouvelle couche sociale); the marshal "must submit or resign" (il faut se soumettre ou se démettre); "the enemy is clericalism" (le cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi). These were the "key-notes" of his campaigns.

When THIERS was driven from power, the opposition to the Republic combined to replace him by Marshal MCMAHON, under whose rule it was hoped it would be possible to lay the foundation of another throne, the choice of its occupant being for the moment put aside. GAMBETTA'S greatest service to his country was the consummate skill and tremendous energy with which he led the resistance to this plot. His task was at once arduous and full of danger. Practically the people had to be instructed in the use of the ballot, and to be convinced that representative government was the only safe one possible for France, while the old leaders of the Empire were in power to repress, corrupt, and pervert the expression of popular opinion, and watching every opportunity to bring the Republican leader within the clutches of the law. But with an admirable combination of audacity and prudence, GAMBETTA, laboring night and day with voice and pen, accomplished the purpose which he had set for himself. In 1877, the country returned to the Assembly an overwhelming majority of Republicans, and shortly after the Senate also was lost to the reactionaries. M. GRÉVY, a Republican de la veille, became President. "The era of danger was closed," or M. GAMBETTA tersely announced: "the era of difficulties had opened." Secure in power, the Republicans divided among themselves. GAMBETTA, called to the head of the Ministry, was sacrificed to the jealousies and ambitions of smaller men, and retired to await a more propitious time for the resumption of that leadership which belonged to him by right of superior services, capacity, and wisdom.

He returned to the conduct of his journal, of ways his favorite occupation. Of the République Française it is small praise to say that he had made it the strongest journal in France. Others, like the Figaro, have a wider circulation, or, like the Journal des Débats, have more conspicuous contributors. None more directly and powerfully influences public opinion, none is on completely in harmony with the new order of things, or contributes so much to establish and perpetuate it. Strictly impersonal in its political department, it discusses both French and foreign affairs with vigor, breadth, and effectiveness. M. DE MORTA'S contributions to its columns have been at all times considerable, and his brilliant statement, caustic wit, and delightful irony will be sadly missed, or will still more his sagacious and determined guidance.

M. GAMBETTA'S death is a severe loss to the republic. If happily it is not an irreparable one, it is largely because of the degree to which he has strengthened its foundations by the education of his countrymen not only in the love of real liberty, but in the employment of the suffrage. That work is regarded by his friends in France, as it was by himself, as his greatest, and ambitions as he unquestionably was, it was the source of his sincerest satisfaction that he had helped to fit his country to do without leadership. It may be added that he was an intelligent and discriminating as well as an ardent friend and admirer of the American republic.

Don Eccilino Ferrara, Florindella-supra-Salinaro, to Leonis Renan, Milton Ernest:

"I HAVE dispatched the book as you desire, my beloved son. I sent it down to Sulduce by Ancuore, so that I trust it will reach you by the post thence in safety. It delights me that an for a may our humble dwelling and one little bandit still keep a hold upon your heart-strings. Nowhere, my dear son, will you have warmer welcome than here; wherever again your steps shall bring you up our narrow mountain path you will bring joy with you. Marta grows very old, but not too old, she bids me say, to love you. May I, your oldest friend, presume on one word of caution? You take a natural interest in your English hostess. Be heedful that it grow not too strong an interest. My mind misgives me when you tell one of those manic lessons, those readings of our poets. No doubt you are of as great an interest to this great lady; but since she is a great lady, and you are a poor or proud as poor, there can be little to be hoped for from this intimacy, and surely its enjoyment is one fraught with peril. Forgive me if I hint this, and attribute my timidity to that which is always tenderness—a great affection. God be with you!"

Leonis Renan, Milton Ernest, to Don Eccilino Ferrara, Florindella-supra-Salinaro:

"DEAR AND REVERED FATHER,—Be not afraid; I have a triple armor of poverty, art, and pride, however misplaced pride may be to one born as I was. She is lovely, and interests me, I admit, if by mere force of contrast betwixt the obvious faults of her character and its potential powers for good. Her intense but unconscious selfishness and her possible greatness of nature, were higher emotions ever to touch her, evoke a psychological study quite new of the common. This sounds very abstract and didactic, but it is thus contrast which interests me, exciting move. However, even this will soon cease to be near me she leaves here, as I told you; it is doubtful whether she returns at all before going to the Riviera for winter.

"It seems that go on from one house to another until a whole autumn can be passed in this series of rooms. It appears to me that they are always as much as seene as if they were on the stage itself. It is an endless round of dressing, dining, trifling, talking; as I have come to understand it through the photographs of her conversation, it seems to me the most rapid existence possible, but she assures me it has its excitements. She says that when once you are dans le train you could never lead any other kind of life. I am grateful that I shall never have the chance to be dans le train myself!

"Be easy on the score of my danger; I have a triple armor, I say, in my poverty, in my pride, in my art. Long ago I loved the woman in Paris that I told you of one summer night sitting in your little porch, with the great golden round moon coming up through purple clouds over the eastern mountains. She died, and what was worse, was worthless. Lowermoiseau and I have parted company for evermore, and I shall be lonely as any hermit in this great house all through the windy English autumn and the darksome English winter. If only there be light enough to paint by, I shall be content.

"I am now painting the Burial of Daphnis. I have on models amongst those burly Oxfordshire men and rheumatic laborers, but I have memories—so many memories—of lithe, light limbs, of brown, leaping forms, of sun-drawn harvest-warm, of rhythmic dances under the arching olive boughs, of naked figures, supple as rose reeds, drawing water with the pole as in the days of Daphnis, in so much we are so little changed in Italy since the years of Theocritus. Ah, dear and best friend, be sure of this, my heart is too much with Italy to wander elsewhere or any fully. Besides, is also sure that if I have grown lighter in mind it's exhaustion than the fourneau-sur, I am no more than a secretary or a teacher in her eyes; at best a Raffaelle whom the haughty queen would hardly deign a glove or give pay with a look. But I guess neither glove nor pay, I shall be quite content if, when she shall see her ball-room finished, she shall smile, and bid me go. A revoir, then, be good and true friend!"

Mr. Hollys, Glenlochrie, Argyllshire, to the Countess of Charteris, Milton Ernest (telegraphs):

"Why don't you come to Drumdrees? They are all furious, and I shall not see you at all, for I am only away for two weeks."

Lady Charteris, Milton Ernest, to Mr Hollys Glenlochrie (writes):

"I'm too sorry, dear Harry, not to see you, but I really can't stand Drumdrees. When I accepted to come I could not tell that poor Kingston would be close by on his own moor. I thought he was going to kill elephants in Africa or India. I should be quite afraid to stir a step outside the gates there for fear of meeting him; he knows me as passionately. I know no evil so vile as that he is a dear, good little boy; he never does anything naughty except when he's in Paris, where it is conceded to all British virtue to go about in slippers, but I can't warn him, even to be one of the dozen Duchesses of Great Britain and Ireland, which all my friends are unanimous in declaring is the only thing worth living for in this world. I am quite content as I am. Yes, I am going on a bit of visits very soon, but not just yet. I have Hermione here, she is rather taken with one of our neighbors, John Herbert of Wardell, he is only just come home from endless travels, and if they like one another, there would be nothing for anybody to say against it, for though they are only baronets, the Wardell family counts back ages before that."

Mr Hollys, Glenlochrie, to Lady Charteris, Milton Ernest:

"That is it, is it? Hermione and Jack Herbert, and you and ——, a pretty partie carrée! Well, there's nothing to say, as you justly observe, against Herbert."

Mr. Hollys, Glenlochrie, to the Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry, Milton Ernest:

"DEAR AUNT,—Pray pardon me, but can't you make Essnée keep her engagements and go to other houses if she won't come to Drumdrees? It begins to look very odd. If she won't go out, get a lot of people down. For Heaven's sake break up the thing somehow. I would come myself, but must be back in Rome in sixty hours."

Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry, Milton Ernest, to Mr Hollys, Glenlochrie:

"MY DEAR HARRY,—No one can be so painfully sensitive as myself to the lamentable improprieties (I might almost employ a stronger word) of my granddaughter, Lady Charteris. But I can do nothing; she is entirely independent, and you know of old her headstrong self-will. She does not go to Cowes, she does not go to any of her friends' houses. I confess with humiliation that I believe she remains at home because she finds a most lamentable attraction in the society of the Rome artist whom you deemed proper to send here. There is, of course, no absolute indiscretion committed; even Essnée has sufficient respect for my presence to make that impossible. But there are very great irregularities, a most reprehensible degree of intimacy. She actually asked this person to dine with us; he had good sense and feeling enough to refuse; but this will indicate to you the footing on which she treats him. He teaches her Italian, and corrects her singing: you know to what this sort of thing is invariably a prelude. Of course you could not imagine that Essnée could so far forget herself as to make a companion of a young man sent to paint her half-room, but it is very unfortunate that you could not find some one at least middle-aged and less good looking than this person is. The whole routine is painful to me, and scandalous on a degree which I can not describe. I see entirely at a loss what to do. Were it any one else I should at once leave a house in which I have ceased to have any influence but I can not of course be the first to ruin my granddaughter's reputation by such a step. I foresaw that some miserable complication would ensue from this ridiculous idea of having an Italian over to paint the ball room; if it had been put in the hands of good decorators, they would have done all that was needed, and Essnée would not have asserted it until the walls were completed. You may be sure that I have exhausted all possible arguments in the endeavor to persuade her of the great and irreparable injury which will fall on her by her familiarity with a foreigner of whom even you admit your know nothing except that he painted the altar of a Roman Catholic church in some village. But I regret to say that I produced no impression; at first she laughed and said there was no harm in learning Italian; at the end of my repeated counsels she hinted to me bluntly that Milton Ernest was hers, and that the manor-house at seniores was mine, of course she meant to say great that I should go there. Can not you and Lord Llandudno, as her trustees, interfere?

"P S.—It is impossible to ask people down when Essnée would not speak to them if they came, and she would not if they were asked to despise of her."

Mr Hollys, Rome, to the Dowager Lady Cairnwrath, Milton Ernest:

"DEAR AUNT,—I am quite too sorry, and can't forgive myself for being such an ass. But as Rome has never before spent three months out of the twelve at Milton, how on earth could I tell the mischief would come on? I am afraid Lord Llandudno and I have no jurisdiction except over the property. We have no right to declare to her almost asking a painter to dinner. In point of fact, we both ask painters to dinner ourselves. You think painters are sweeps, but indeed the world has changed its mind about these things; I think she might ask him to dinner, but I am quite with you in thinking that for her to flirt with him is a hideous enormity. Besides, it is enough on the poor wretch himself, since nothing can come of it, for when she's tired of Tasso and the mandoline she'll forget he exists in twenty four hours, and expect him to take five hundred pounds for his frescoes and be grateful. I don't fancy you need worry yourself seriously, though I can entirely understand how annoying it all is to you, and I wish to Heaven I had never found out Renan's studio. It was hard enough to find, for it was up a hundred and ninety-five stairs, precipitous and pitch-dark, and it had a pumpkin tied to a string for a knocker."

Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry, Milton Ernest, to Mr Hollys, Rome:

"I am unhappily aware, my dear Henry, that your world nowadays thinks all moral distinctions unnecessary, and all serious considerations pedantic. At the same time, if Lord Llandudno do ask painters to dinner, he would be the last man to allow one of his daughters to marry one of them, and I now solemnly warn you that I consider it quite possible that my granddaughter Essnée might in her madness and furious obstinacy throw herself away on this man. It is time, I think you will allow, for a conseil de famille on this most terrible dilemma."

Mr Hollys, Rome, to Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry, Milton Ernest:

"But there are no conseils de famille in England. What on earth shall we do?"

Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry, to Mr. Hollys (telegraphs):

"Can not you get his Ministers in Rome to send him home? What use are extradition treaties?"

Mr Hollys to Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry (telegraphs):

"But if we have done nothing wrong, how can we demand his extradition? I am at my wits' end. I write to Llandudno. I am sure he will run down to Milton."

Dowager Lady Cairnwrath of Othwestry to Mr. Hollys (telegraphs):

"I shall be happy to see Lord Llandudno, and I imagine Lady Charteris can scarcely turn her back on her own trustee. But he as good as to remember that it was not Lord Llandudno who sent this person here."

PART II.

Lord Llandudno, Milton Ernest, to Hon. H Hollys, Rome:

"DEAR HARRY,—I came down here as you asked me, I made a protest out of the Monmouthshire lanes. On my life I don't see what I can do. I think Tabby's fears have run away with her judgment. If Essnée is great on your Roman friend, the concessis is remarkably well. I like the man myself, he is a gentleman, and he has out-and-out talent. He will make a superb thing of the ball-room: his designs are worthy a Parthenon. It seems the fellow reads Italian with her, and in correcting her style of singing, and showing her the tricks of the mandolino, and all this goes on at tea-time in the ball-room, she lets him be quite quiet till five o'clock. I told Lady Cairnwath (who raves) that I thought we did better to leave Estelle alone; she is not a babe, and she gets her back up very soon, and really to suggest to her that she can't be decently civil to a person who is doing things for her worthy of Domenichino, without compromising herself, or meaning to make a fool of herself about him, seems to me to be going very near the wind. I never do favor saying things to women that a man would knock you down for if you tried 'em on with him. Interference, I always believe, is the very kind hoof of the devil. She is not the sort of woman for imprudences: it will be much more like her to amuse herself with the fellow while the novelty lasts, and then write him a check and forget his existence. She's as proud as blazes, and never would let herself down. It was a mistake having him in the house, perhaps: he might have lived in the village, but I don't think it matters. If she don't move before, she'll go to Cannes. I wish, with you, that she'd take poor Vic., but I can't see a chance of it. Little Hamin Latrobe is here, and going on with fifteen of Wardell till all's blue. Tabby will have it that your friend's an adventurer, a schemer, all the rest of it, and that he has all kinds of dark conspiracies on compromise Estelle and drive her up in a corner to marry him. But all this is moonshine. The man strikes me as a thorough gentleman. He bangs back whenever Estelle wants him to come out of his painting-room. They talk French, and I see not A1 at French, but as far as I can make out they quaver! a good deal. Hermione knows all they say, but she's a sly little mouse when she chooses. At all events, I'm quite sure interference wouldn't do any good: if you try to ride Estelle with a gag bit she flings you a cropper at once; just like my daughters.

Truly yours, dear Hollys, LLANDUDNO.

"P.S.—Tabby's always for the gag-bit! What a time the defunct C. of O. must have had of it, and how glad he must be of those eternal shades, where the bothered are at rest! But if she joes him when she dies!"

Mr. Hollys to Lord Llandudno:

"DEAR LLANDUDNO,—So many thanks! you relieve my mind tremendously. The venerable C. of O always foresees a conflagration of the universe whenever anybody strikes a match, especially if it's struck on the wrong box. Renan is a gentleman, I see sure; there's much old patrician blood in as many of those fellows even when they're not very sure where they come from originally. I quite agree with you about riding with a light hand. They forgive a servant; I have to write a report on the amenities of jute and other similar articles used in this country during each year, which really and truly is only consular work. Nobody at F. O. in the least wants to know this, and nobody will ever read the report; it will be safely pigeon-holed for fifty years, and then be burned, still unread; but duty is duty, even when the thermometer is at 65° R. in the shade, and is in the twentieth day of August which finds your wretched friend in the Urbs—Eternal City it is no more—it is all going, pounded into dust under tramway cars and the modern builder's lust of stucco. We are in an age in which nothing is sacred. I expect they will get chopping at the palm of Augustus. Ever yours." etc

Lamia Rosa, Milton Ernest, to Don Revellino Ferraris, Fiorisella-supra-Salsano:

"How BELOVED FATHER AND FRIEND,—Tuer kindly fears for my peace may be at rest. Mi-ladi is gone, they say she will not return till the spring. A week or two ago there arrived on a visit here an English lord with a name I can not remember, and could not spell if I did. He was one of her tutors; only now that she is of age to be her own mistress his powers of jurisdiction only extend on her property. In England it appears the property is always the first care. It is to fenced up and tied about in favor of people unborn that nobody ever seems thoroughly to enjoy it; but I me by on means sure that this self-denial is not the cause of the nation's great prosperity and solidarity.

"I think she is sorry to go. She seems interested in the studies that I have persuaded her to take up, she is beginning to understand what good singing is. I suppose her professors were too intent in making them agreeable to a young countess with two hundred thousand pounds a year to make themselves disagreeable by insisting on accuracy and moderation in the use of natural powers. She is certainly regretful to go; she said as much frankly to me last night. But it seems she has neglected many engagements, and those unhappy great people are the slaves of their own world; it reminds me of Frankenstein! The lord with the strange Welsh name did not, I think, approve of her intimacy with me. He was a very light-hearted, pleasant, easy person, but he had quick eyes and a great deal of tact under that peculiar rough manchaleure which is as common to English gentlemen; they wear it like a sort of loose overcoat, under which they conceal everything. I do not know whether it was by persuasion or stratagem that he induced her to make those visits which she had promised to make in the coming month, but directly or indirectly he induced her to do so: a week after he left she went away; her grandmother is gone also.

"This great place seems very silent and lonely. Nothing can exceed her kindness in the orders she has given for my comfort. I am to ride or drive my horse if please, and the household is to obey all my commands. I imagine the servants do not like this at all. I am half afraid they accredit me with the delightful profession of a spy! My friend the head gardener glares in content; he is very fond of me, because I love flowers, and understand something of them, as all artists are bound to do. So here I me alone, with the exception of this legion of servants, who seem to me to do nothing but eat, yawn, and dress. The place grows on me for all that, and were there only fewer rainy days, there would be little of which to complain. The grandeur of the yews and cedars, of the huge oaks and of the long avenues of limetrees, is always solemn, quieting, and beautiful. When the day grows too dark to paint more, I go out in the park—in the home woods, as they are called. Some of the deer are growing to know me, and one doe has become as friendly that comes to meet me. They say she is old; but she is a pretty creature, with a silver collar round her throat, placed there by the last earl, whose pet she was. Her name is on it, Nerina—the name, you will remember, of my poor mother. It is like finding an old friend in this strange land. I hear this earl, whose name was Alured, was much in Italy, and had a that the people have evil foreign tastes. I believe he was not at all a good man, and there are odd tales of him. on my ally, the gardener-in-chief, tells me. this gardener by-the-way, has a charming house in the village, keeps a pony carriage, and has an income that would make a Venetian or Florentine gentleman rich. This gossiping will only interest you as enabling you to figure to yourself my daily life here. I confess I miss the presence of mileoli; it would be strange to do otherwise; but I am solitary without being dull: I am never dull where I have my fancy free, and can go at will into the open air. It is true, the air here is out always inviting.

"I am becoming afraid, I candidly own, of getting too used to this life of ease. I have always seen born floors, born walls where I had not scrawled over them, the simplest furniture, the simplest food, a dish of soup, and bread and fruit, a little flask of montreli wine making all my banquet; but now—so soon does one learn bad habits!—now it seems quite natural to find my bath filled for me, my clothes brushed and ready, my wants all anticipated, a table spread thrice a day for me alone, with egg-shell china and Queen Anne plate, and all sorts of delicious and French wines, while two powdered giants seem around me so mercilessly as if they were mice. It all means so natural, and I am humiliated to feel that I shall miss it all when I go back to the old life of privation. And I used to think myself, not so long ago, a philosopher, a poet, content with the food of spirit, and scorning the comforts of the flesh. I am half afraid that, like many other wiseacres, I only learned what I was ignorant of! To be sure, in our climate, it is easier to be reconciled to a crust and a handful of plums than to would be here, and a bare floor does not seem so mean when it has our sombrone shining down on it, and a trail of a wild vine straying across it. Still, it is ill to lie in Capua when one knows that on the morrow one must go away to toil and uncertainty and the hunger of hope deferred. No; before me it is not, as you will suppose, regret for a woman that makes me feel that it will be a heavy trial to leave this place. It is considerations much greater, much baser, much lower, that weigh on me. I am neither an ætical nor an spiritual as I thought, but I am, as ever, your devoted and grateful," etc., etc.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Two well-dressed men were recently sentenced in Cincinnati to pay a fine of $150 each, and to suffer a month's imprisonment, for stealing an umbrella worth a dollar and a half. A Cincinnati newspaper endeavors to ward off a panic by explaining that it was the bad reputation of the men, and their manner of taking the umbrella from the rack, which convicted them. "Under similar circumstances," it adds, "in charge of larceny could be sustained against a reputable person."

The State of Minnesota recently found its treasury empty. The Railway Commissioner requested the managers of the trunk lines to advance a part of the three per cent. tax on the gross earnings of the roads, which would not be due for several months. The roads immediately came to the rescue with $80,000, and the State was enabled to keep its departments open.

Christmas was celebrated on a moving railway train between Cincinnati and Terre Haute by an opera company. A Christmas tree was prepared in one of the drawing-room cars, one of the singers personated Santa Claus, presents were exchanged, and speeches were made, and all while the train was speeding along at the rate of forty-five miles an hour.

It is said that Victor Hugo slept during nearly all of his play Le Roi s'Amuse on the occasion of its recent reproduction in Paris fifty years after the date of its production. A critic unkindly adds, "So did many in the audience."

The municipal authorities of Indianapolis have adopted a plan which they think may result in the removal of telegraph poles from the streets. It is to tax the telegraph companies two dollars a year for each pole. The companies can avoid payment of this pole-tax by putting their wires under-ground.

Item from an Illinois paper: "Napoleon Le Mountain, the well-known bank burglar, who spends under a cloud of aliases, among which are 'Little Corporal' and 'Frenchy,' has been for two days attempting to pick the lock of the old safe at the Chicago coal Alcon office, the key having got lost some days ago." M. La Mountain's reputation is at stake.

Highwaymen armed with sand-clubs prowl the streets of Chicago at night. A Chicago paper advises persons who are not late to walk on the middle of the street for safety's sake.

The recent overflow of the river Seine drove vast numbers of rats out of the Paris sewers, and it is said that residents in certain quarters were falsely overrun by the rodents, finding them in their shoes, in their dressing-case drawers, and in all sorts of odd places, when they arose in the morning. Cats and rat-catching dogs were in great demand.

Beavers are building across Feather River, in California, a dam, in which they are using large cottonwood-trees. All the dams that the miners have built for protection against spring freshets have been washed away, and as it is said that beaver dams are never thus destroyed, the miners are watching with deep interest the results of the little animals' engineering.

The first number of Le Passage de Venus has appeared in France. It will be published as often as Venus crosses the sun's disk in line with the earth. The next issue will be on June 6 of the year 2004. Now is the time to subscribe.

A Detroit man has invented a furnace in which refuse tinware, oyster cans, fruit cans, etc., can be so treated that the solder shall be restored to commerce, and the sheets of tin made suitable for manufacturing purposes. At this rate of progress onward a higher civilization it won't be long before it will be impossible for a poor family to keep a goat.

Cartridges of powdered quisbillino, cassogly compressed, have been used with good results for blasting in English coal mines. Water is introduced into the cartridge through a perforated iron tube, and the chemical action rends the solid mass without noise, smoke, or danger. The upper parts of New York city, where extensive blasting is necessary before building can begin, and where the explosions are attended with danger to the public, afford a good field for the trial of the new method.

A dealer in New Orleans avers that he sends 1,500,000 cocoa-nut shells to New York annually to be ground up with black pepper.

Three men were captured by an Oregon mob a few nights ago and hanged. An account of the affair says that the men were accused of an especified crimes, but were known to be bad men, and were "hung on general principles."

There are many things to be taken into consideration before deciding what character one shall personate at a mask ball. A young man of Memphis went as George Washington, and became tipsy. The magistrate before whom he was arraigned mided fifteen dollars on the usual fine because he had disgraced himself while personating the Father of his Country.

Speaking of Senator Anthony's bill to prohibit the use of capital for other than legitimate purposes, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch says, "This bill ought to stop about half the legislation of an average session."

A Canadian who nearly froze to death while driving to his home has described his sensations to a reporter. The condition of extreme suffering gave place to a feeling of grateful warmth and exhilaration. "The sleigh, instead of crawling along at a snail's pace, appeared to glide through the air with great swiftness, and the horses fairly flew like pigeons. A mass of exultation filled the farmer's breast as he urged the horses to still greater speed, and the woods on each side were passing so quickly that they became indistinguishable black lines. Then the sleigh bells sounded fainter and fainter, until the chimes disappeared in the distance, the farmer fell gradually into a delicious slumber, which came near being the sleep that knows no waking, and he knew no more until brought to life under a vigorous treatment."

While the customs of receiving New Year's callers was generally honored in Washington this year, it was observed by comparatively few in New York. Under any other form of government than a republican the example set at the capital would be likely to result next season in a revival of the custom in the metropolis of the nation. Perhaps it will as it is.

While the ten Brooklyn Aldermen were confined recently to the Raymond Street Jail for contempt of court one of them was accosted by a tramp whom he had himself sentenced while sitting on the place of a police justice. Speaking in a husky voice, the tramp reminded the Alderman of their previous meeting, said he was to be released on the following day, and kindly inquired whether he could do anything for him.

In Philadelphia recently Mr. Wilhelm Steinitz, the famous chess-player, offered to put himself against any thirty players that could be produced, and to play the thirty games simultaneously. Only sixteen players came forward. The first few moves, stereotyped openings for the most part, were made rapidly, the champion stopping for only a moment at each board. As the games progressed he gave more thought to his play, but seldom hesitated more than half a minute. Three hours from the beginning he had won all the games but one.

Although Secretary Teller was unable to grant the request which the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Indians brought to Washington not long ago, he was compelled to pay a tribute to the antiquity of the land. He told them that their claim to the Turtle Mountain country had been traced back ten hundred years, but that they had on better claim to that tract than the other Chippewas, because they could base their claim only on the tribal title of immemorial occupancy. There are ten thousand white settlers on the tract claimed by the Turtle Mountain Chippewas, which embraces nine million acres of desirable land in Northern Dakota.

The Utah Commission, it is said, will recommend the abolition of woman suffrage in that Territory, on the ground that it is one of the main supports of Mormonism and polygamy. It is asserted that the Mormon women vote as a duty to the Church, while the "Gentile" women refrain from voting, and thus the Mormon element obtains an advantage in the Territory that it would not have otherwise.

An aged Indian was bewailing in Virginia City, Nevada, not long ago, the apathy of his race to respect to matters of a warlike nature. "Old times gone," he said. "Long 'go Shoshone meet Piute, Piute meet Washoe, one get killed. Now when meet, sit down and eat."

Writing from Washington, a correspondent of the Boston Advertiser tells of "an aristocracy unlike that of any other city." It is supremely indifferent to politics, and he says the writer, composed mainly of the army and navy and the remnants of an old aristocracy which has clung to the government like a barnacle for half a century. Its members live in pretentious boarding-houses, and have always such on acquaintance in the ultra-fashionable circles that they are found at all their receptions and parties. They are generally in receipt of a quarterly check upon the Treasury—"a memento of some deceased relative who years ago belonged on the military establishment—or else have some perquisite in a department which yields a petty income without much work." The writer says that they hold a most supreme contempt of that class to Washington whom they style Congressional people. "Revelling in the memory of by gone relatives who once drew salaries from the nation," it is added, "they hold themselves in lofty contempt of these later gentlemen who now hold the places which their grandfathers occupied." They are described as an aristocracy based simply upon traditions of official place.

"A PUBLIC FOUNTAIN IN THE CITY OF MOROCCO."—ENGRAVED, BY PERMISSION OF MESSRS. WILLIAMS & EVERETT, BOSTON, FROM THE PAINTING BY EDWIN LORD WEEKS.

EDWIN LORD WEEKS

THE artist of the beautiful picture of which an engraving is given on this page was born in the city of Boston, Massachusetts, in 1849. Evincing very early a predilection for the pursuit of art, he went to Paris while quite young, and studied there in L'Ecole des Beaux Arts, and afterward in the studios of GÉRÔME and BONNAT. He imbibed a love for the delineation of Eastern life in the treatment of which he has been very successful. For several years Mr WEEKS travelled in various Eastern countries, carefully studying the manners and customs of the people, their modes of life, their architecture, and the scenery, filling his sketch-books with artistic memoranda, and firing his imagination with the spirit of the marvellous scenes in which he sojourned.

Mr WEEKS is a member of the Boston Art Club, and has exhibited works in this country, at the Paris Salon, the Paris Société des Amis des Arts, and other places. Among his pictures are "A Cup of Coffee in the Desert," "A Pilgrimage to the Jordan," "A Scene in Tangiers," "Jerusalem from the Bethany Road," "An Arab Story Teller"—which was exhibited at the Centennial in 1876—"Alhambra Windows," "A Moorish Camel-Driver"—exhibited in the Paris Salon in 1878—"They Toil not, neither do they Spin," etc. He has never departed from his early fondness for the East, and his later works, as, for example, the one which we engrave, show a constantly increasing power in technique, and a steady growth in those qualities of imagination and perception which distinguish the true artist.

Mr WEEKS has resided in Paris for several years, making frequent visits to Cairo, Jerusalem, Damascus, Tangiers, and other Eastern cities. A portrait of him will be found on page 29

THE NEW CASINO

SOMETHING over a year ago HARPER'S WEEKLY gave an exterior view of the new Casino from the drawings of the architects, Messrs. KIMBALL & WISEDELL. The architectural promise given by the drawings has been more than fulfilled as to the outside of the building, while the interior, of which some sketches are given in this issue, is not less interesting and successful.

The material chosen for the building was favorable to repose. The outside is virtually a monochrome in red baked clay, for the angle auditions of the Broadway elevation are almost the only stones visible. The surface, however, is relieved from monotony by the employment in the walls of alternate bands of Croton and Callateeg brick, slightly different in tint, while the terra cotta is of a still brighter tint, and the visible wood-work is painted in complementary olive. These are all excellent materials, the selected common brick having a better color and giving much more sense of texture than the costlier pressed brick, while the terra cotta is not only of good color, but is moulded with unfailing sharpness and precision, inasmuch that the large band of arabesque ornament below the uppermost stages of the tower and the moulded string-courses of the front are distinct and effective from the street, although the relief does not exceed two inches.

The defects of the composition are scarcely worth mention in comparison with its excellences. The terminal pier at the southern end of the Broadway front looks slender and weak for its position, although this defect will be much mitigated, if it does not disappear altogether, when the balcony, shown in the drawings, is inserted in the tall and narrow arch near the pier, so as visibly to tie it to the main wall. The terra-cotta rosaces of the longer flat arches have not depth enough to appear to contain the arch line, and it is evident that the real reliance for the support of the superincumbent wall to open the inconspicuous iron lintels, the pressure upon which the relieving arches can scarcely relieve appreciably. On the other hand, the courageous experiment of exhibiting the sweep of a theatrical auditorium above a nearly rectangular base is completely successful, and the skill with which these contradictory forms have been blended, and the ellipse adjusted to the square upon which it stands, is thoroughly admirable. The detail, the motives of which have been suggested generally by the Saracenic architecture of Spain, and sometimes by that of Egypt, is uniformly well studied. Copious as is the ornament, the masses are so strong that the building nowhere seems overloaded, and so much intelligent study has been given to the ornament itself that it everywhere invites and repays study.

The interior, of which the outside is the expressive venture, is the result of a careful study of the requirements of the plan. It is a theatre and ball-room and concert garden, with the dependences required by each of these uses, in which the optical and acoustical necessities of the case have controlled the forms. Nothing has been sacrificed to "making architecture," and consequently the interior architecture has the unusually satisfactory look of having come of itself. The flattened curve which takes the place of the conventional horseshoe line of the gallery front looks a little forced and capricious, but this is almost a solitary exception to the rule. There are a number of interesting points of arrangement, the most noteworthy of them being the garden on the roof, which gives scope for some ingenious features in the form of sheltered balconies and porches, one of which, a tiled porch, is included in the illustrations. The suspension of the orchestra above the proscenium has been introduced in former works by the authors of the Casino, but has never been developed into so important and successful a feature of the interior architecture as in this building.

In fact, it would not be easy to name an interior in New York which has been so thoroughly thought out in detail as that of the Casino, and which has so much the appearance of having been "designed all over." Moorish architecture, which the architects have not so much adopted as taken for their point of departure, contains an almost inexhaustible repertory and an endless suggestion of surface ornament, and the mine has hardly been worked at all. The only Moorish interior here which can be compared for thoroughness and skill of design with that of the Casino is the Temple Emanu-El, in Fifth Avenue, which is now some fifteen years old. That work, brilliant and successful as it is, lacks the relief which with the Moorish architects of Spain at least was always an integral element in decoration. The interior of the Casino is throughout wrought in reliefs in varying patterns executed in the material of the Moorish architects—a tough plaster. It owes as much to the Moorish work than each generation of Moorish workmen owed to its predecessors. The inspiration and the system are Moorish; the details of design are in almost every case original. Many of them are in themselves very interesting, although what is most interesting is the relation of them to each other. The relief of the arabesques varies somewhat with the scale and density of the ornament, according to size and position. It is everywhere slight, however, but everywhere sufficient to give a peculiar life and changefulness to the color applied to it—a changefulness which prevents the patterns from becoming tiresome, and gives a new aspect to every piece of decoration with each new point of view. The scale of the ornament varies greatly, from the great polygon which fills the domed centre of the ceiling to the surfaces of the lower walls, in which the unit of design is a square of only a few inches.

Moorish architecture, inexhaustible as it is as a repertory of surface decoration, does not contain all the elements needed in a modern theatre; and the architects of the Casino have not scrupled to introduce elements from other historical styles with a success that entirely justifies them. As in the Temple Emanu-El, there is a mixture of Gothic and Moorish detail. The canopies that divide the proscenium-boxes vertically are reminiscences of late French Gothic. The inverted cones that connect the stalls over the Moorish shafts with the ceiling are reminiscences of English perpendicular vaulting, and reproduce in their decoration the fan tracery of King's College Chapel at Cambridge and Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster. But these features when such an affinity with the Moorish work as to assure the spectator that the Moorish architects only did not use them because they did not know them. Rather more disputable is the introduction in the soffits of the galleries of sunken panels surrounded by prominent mouldings. These are constructively meaningless, and scarcely happy enough as decoration to make us forget that fact. But in general it is true that unity has been attained by means of these diverse elements; and that in the only rational test that can be applied to the eclecticism of a modern architect who is to produce works which can not have an exact historical parallel.

We have spoken of the color-decoration of the Casino, but blue is the only pigment that has been used with any freedom, although a dull red has been sparingly introduced in the dado of the auditorium. In place of the blue, red, and gold of the Alhambra, the walls and ceiling are covered with metallic lustres of bronze and silver and copper. The resultant tint is a pale terra-cotta, complementary to the blue, and the effect is of a sheeny softness. The combination of richness and softness, at which the architects seem to have aimed, has without doubt been attained, and of itself constitutes an unusual success in color decoration. But it is doubtful whether pigments might not, with advantage, be introduced more freely at points and lines calling for special emphasis, with the result of more sharply separating the various fields of decoration and accenting structural divisions, which are now not indeed confused, but scarcely so brought out as to give the architecture its full value in the decoration.

But it seems ungrateful to find any fault at all with a beautiful work which gives us so much pleasure, or even to suggest change in it. After one has gone over the building again and again, his surprise increases at the thoroughness with which it has been designed, and the study which has been given to every square yard of its surface. Nothing seems to have been forgotten, and nothing slurred. In such details as the pavement of the vestibule—a very effective mosaic in broken tiles—and the grills of the bases, and the brass and glass of the chandeliers, it is as evident as in the most conspicuous features of the building that they have been thought about. This is rare praise to give a modern building, and especially a building built, as the Casino has been built, in a hurry. Its owners and its architects are to be congratulated upon having made a valuable addition to the architectural ornaments of the city. Study of it makes more incomprehensible the neglect of such a mine of detail as Moorish architecture offers, by so many of our young architects, who have forsaken it to follow the aimless vagaries of the English Renaissance.

Alas! could we but wander

Then sleep, O mighty Pharaoh."

FIVE YEARS AFTERWARD.

CHAPTER XVI

CONTINUED.

Miss Brake was not talking in her sleep; on the contrary, she was calm and matter-of-fact in her stern decisiveness. She spoke as if she knew, thought Kitty Vanch, who accepted the assertion, and did not in any way gainsay it, although one natural question escaped her at the moment.

"Who told you?"

"I have found it out; but there are reasons why I should put you on your guard against this woman," she replied; "and you can guess them."

"I must not trust her," suggested Kitty.

"And must be watchful of her—always."

"But will she ever disclose—"

"Oh! I do not want her co-operation," cried Miss Brake, almost scornfully now, "as her evidence. It will be complete without her, and I shall face them with my proofs some day. I see it all now—to the end."

Wise woman she now so much, and who would presumptuously shape out the workings of her little world, who saw virtue triumphant and vice overwhelmed as by God's hand it should be; who, from her misty cloud-land, as from heaven, saw the iron hands of Justice dragging forth to the light the shivering, pitiful Cain, who had lain in ambush all this while!

"What motive could Mrs. Chadderton have had in keeping back the truth?" said Kate Vanch, musingly, "whom has she tried to screen, I wonder?"

"We shall not wonder very long," said Hester, confidently. "And now do not speak of this again to me, or to any one in this house. It's my secret, no one else's; my plan of action, not yours."

"I will try and not think of it," said Kitty. "But, oh! dear mistress, if you could set it aside too for a while! if you only would!" she entreated.

"Is it possible?"

"There have been so many dark days in your life, which I had hoped this visit would brighten—which I meant to help to brighten, thinking this would be a pleasant holiday," said Kate.

"Pleasant holiday!" echoed back Miss Brake. "I am like that strange young woman whom my brother Morris married, and there is no pleasure in the world for me. Why should there be? Why should it come to one so dissatisfied and suspicious and afflicted as I am—as I have always been, Kitty?"

"Oh, no, no; you have not."

"Pleasure is for the young—for men with money, sometimes; for girls with lovers, always," she said, musingly, "and yet what a crowd of disappointments, Kitty, comes to him who schemes, and the woman who dreams!"

Kitty looked wonderingly at her, to if this concerned meeting were scarcely in her usual tone, or to be reconciled with many words and acts preceding yesterday—as if she were disposed to believe in happiness herself, and to take credit for some brighter days in store for her. For Greg loved her, as in the old bed days, but with a purer heart; and she loved Greg Dorward very faithfully. Only a few days back Miss Brake had spoken of the promise of her future, and now she seemed to warn her, although she had said that pleasure was for girls with lovers always. Has did she know that unless from story-books, she who had stood apart from love and lovers all her life, thought Kitty, despising it and them, to one soured by long illness on a plain face might do with some excuse, poor thing!

There was no further conversation on this subject; when Kitty would have replied, the invalid lady raised her thin hand in protest; and the companion, trained to obedience, was silent, and silent very willingly. Presently Miss Brake closed her eyes again, and Kitty did not venture to disturb her. There were brighter thoughts for her, and the death of Morris Brake her five years back, and had affected her at that time by the mystery surrounding it, and by her depth of sympathy for the sister's grief, rather than by any absorbing interest she had experienced herself in the young fellow struck from the life-roll.

She was almost doubtful if Miss Brake had gained any fresh intelligence, and whether this was not another phase of eccentricity on her part. That she said and did strange things at times no one knew better than Kate Vanch; she was often harsh and repellent, but more often still full of a Christian sympathy with the unfortunate of her kind, that was remarkable even in a tender hearted woman. Hence an inconsistent female, which is a rara avis at all times, we trust.

Coming to Farm Forlorn had disturbed Miss Brake, thought Kitty; and to the mistress as opposed to judge by first appearances, it was possible she had disliked the look of Mrs. Chadderton. For, thought Kitty, she had done that herself, and had felt a little frightened of the housekeeper, who had so lurid and strange a face, and whose deep-set eyes looked at her and her mistress so inquiringly—perhaps so unfavorably—as an intruders in a home which she had ruled with a mild despotism, but still a despotism, for more years than the new-comers were aware.

And Kate Vanch had forgot to think about—a pleasanter subject than Mrs. Chadderton, or mystery, or murder. Here were four memories of last night's wanderings by the sea shore with him, of all that he had said, of more that he had implied, and her mistress's sad words did not overcloud her long. Kitty's heart was against it, the very day, with its sunshine, its birds and flowers in the garden beyond, was against it; even the drowsy hum of the bees spoke of calm content and honey gathering, and the young girl's heart was full of gratitude for the great change in her life. Bolter's Rents lay further back to her than to Greg Dorward; she could scarcely believe now in the reality, it was all so distant and obscure, so hideous and so real—an enigma, a mad dream. She had been one of the many wholly designed of; she remained one of the few who had gone steadily upward, looking neither to the right nor to the left. Yes, John Woodhatch, clumsy philanthropist as he had been, had done good service here: he thought so himself, as though the work was done for good, and he had never heard in all his life that it was in humankind to err.

"What are you thinking of, Kate?" came the sharp voice of Hester Brake upon Kate's ears at last.

"I—I hardly know."

"You were smiling—almost laughing."

"Was I? I am very sorry," answered Kitty, in good faith, and with no natural intent in her apology.

"You have nothing to be sorry for. I am glad you see happy already," Hester said, curtly. "Let us walk in the garden for a little while, this room is very stifling."

"I will fetch your bonnet."

"No, this will do," and very quickly Miss Brake twisted a white handkerchief over her head, and without much regard to the effect which such an extempore covering might give to her personal appearance.

"The sunshades too," added Kate.

"There are the best sunshades" answered the mistress, "and there is a seat under that big apple-tree yonder, is there not?"

"Yes."

"Let us go there, Kate. It will be cooler than in the house."

Miss Brake's wish was a command, and offering her arm to the delicate woman, Kate Vanch escorted her mistress into the garden which stretched round Farm Forlorn—a fine expanse of flowers and fruit trees and grass-plat, from which immemorable standards rich with russet orange and flourished.

"It is a fair picture," said Hester Brake, when they were seated under the apple-tree, and were looking across the lawn at the long length of farm-house, with its latticed windows blinking in the sun. "Why did he call it Farm Forlorn, as if he had foreknowledge of the misery to come?"

"It was called Farm Forlorn before his time, I have heard him say."

"Oh yes; I had forgotten," said Hester. "I remember Morris being full of a legend that the old house stood above here years and years ago, and the sea came closer to its walls. It was a smuggler's hiding-place in those old days; it is a murderer's now."

"Do you think the murderer is there, then?" said Kitty, in a low tone—"still living in the place?"

"I do not say that, exactly. Who can tell? Speak of something else, Kate," she said, tetchily; "you have had enough of my misery to-day. Tell me of your younger thoughts."

"What will they be, I wonder?" replied Kitty, not wondering very much, for all that. "I have had so much to think about since I came."

"Yes, I suppose so," said Miss Brake, absently.

"Do you think Mr. Woodhatch will ever marry, madam?" asked Kitty, somewhat irrelevantly, and for the sake of starting an entirely new subject for discussion.

Hester Brake started, and turned toward her companion to see for herself—and if it were possible—whether there was any covert meaning in the question. But the frank, clear eyes were self-evident evidence of fairness.

"What a question, Kate! Why should I think of it?"

"It has often seemed to me so great a pity."

"What has?" came the sharp inquiry at this too.

"So great a pity, I mean, that he should have remained a single man all his life—he so good and honest and earnest, as deserving of—of—"

"Of a termagant or a fool to sit by his fireside and worry him. Is that what you mean?" asked Hester Brake, who was certainly hard to please on any subject that bright afternoon.

"Not exactly. Why should it be either of the two?"

"He would go to extremes—from Lucy Brake, a good-looking simpleton at best—"

"Oh, madam!"

"I think so—for she was romantic, and made a hero out of Morris, and we know what poor Morris was. From Lucy Brake," she continued, "John Woodhatch would pass to the other extreme, and marry a scold, if he took to himself a wife now."

"I don't see—"

"And you don't know, Kate, and all this is speculative meandering which tries my temper not a little," she said; "but I am in a fretful mood to-day. Bear with me, please. I shall want your help, true friend—and soon."

"Trust me," answered Kate Vanch, very readily.

"As you will treat me—always?" said Miss Brake.

"Yes."

"Hating me never—under any circumstances?" she asked, very anxiously.

"Oh, never, Miss Hester—never!"

"Remember that," she said; "remember you have promised that."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE LOVERS.

Hester Brake and her young companion had not sat long in the garden ground of Farm Forlorn before Greg Dorward came across the lawn toward them.

Kate, who first saw him advancing, gave a little start of joyful surprise, and said:

"Here he is. I thought he would not be long."

"So this is he," said Miss Brake, in a low tone. "How strange it seems that I see him for the first time, having heard of him so much."

"Strange to me too that this should seem like the beginning of a new life."

"It is the beginning," answered the mistress. "Hem it will end, Kate, it is not for you, or me, or Ann to guess."

Kate turned quickly to her, and Miss Brake added, almost bitterly:

"It is for John Woodhatch, the wise master, who regulates Greg Dorward's life, and sees it keeps step with your own. Introduce me—he is here."

Greg was close upon them now. He raised his hat as he advanced, and with an easy grace, indicative almost of an unborn courtesy.

"And this man comes from the prison and the reformatory!" muttered Miss Brake, "yes, he is remarkable."

"Kitty," said Greg, shaking hands with his fiancée, "I am sorry I was not here at the time of your arrival. May I say welcome to you, in a little behind time with my greeting?"

"Yes—thank you," said Kitty; then she turned to her companion and added, "This is Mr. Dorward, Miss Hester. Greg, this is my true and tried friend Miss Brake, whom you know by report very well."

"Which I hope to know better by the honor of a personal acquaintance," said Greg, with a low bow.

Hester Brake bowed low in response, but did not offer to shake hands with him, as under all the circumstances Greg thought she would have done. She regarded him very intently—Greg thought almost rudely—and said,

"Have we not met before?"

"Oh no."

"Your voice seems familiar to me," said Hester Brake, thinking perhaps of the last night's meeting, wherein Greg had flattered himself that he had well disguised his organ of speech.

"No, Miss Brake, I have not had the pleasure of meeting you before," said Greg, who exalted his manifold accomplishments certainly possessed the art of lying with facility and frankness.

"It is always a matter of interest to me to meet any one who has known my brother Morris," she said, speaking very slowly. "Sometimes I hope to obtain from one so another of his past acquaintances a clew to the mystery of his death. I do not despair."

"It is a mystery which, in my own small way, I have endeavored to solve, Miss Brake," said Greg, politely but gravely, as befitted the solemnity of the subject.

"And without result?" she added.

"Without much result—at present."

"Oh! then you have a clew, perhaps—an idea—a theory," she said, "your living here so long, knowing Morris so well, has—"

"Pardon me, but I know very little of your brother. I came here to a youth, and within two days afterward he was murdered. We had not exchanged a dozen words together, I should say; I was a boy, he was a man."

"Mr. Dorward, I have not come to the farm to oppress everybody in it with what disturbs my mind terribly," she said, by way of explanation. "After to-day, I may not allude to my brother's death again, whatever I may think or do. But coming here for the first time in my life has, Kate will tell you, very much unsettled me, and the old sad business risen up again. I have been told by Mr. Woodhatch you are a singularly acute and clever young man—"

"Mr. Woodhatch is too kind; he flatters me too much," said Greg, with a deprecating manner, and laughing a little rum, though he did not take his eyes from Miss Brake, whose earnestness interested him.

"And doubtless you are clever," continued Hester, without heeding his interruption, "as Mr. Woodhatch would not give you on good character. Will you tell me your idea as to the motive for my brother's murder—and then the subject shall not be mentioned hasween us again."

"I have no fixed idea; the mystery was too complete," Greg replied. "I can only imagine some long, desperate grudge against him, or—"

He paused for a moment, and then went on:

"—or some one pressing very much by his death, and in a way that is not yet clear to us. Had he been rich, had his death meant riches to another, there would have been a motive, which seems wholly lacking now."

"Yes," said Hesen Brake, very thoughtfully, "had he been rich! and the person or persons benefiting by his decease would have incurred your suspicion?"

"They would, I think."

"They would be—they are—Lucy Brake and myself, then," said Hester. "My father died in Paris, a rich man; has money passes presently to Morris's wife and child, and to me, the sole surviving daughter of Julian Brake."

"Oh, I was not aware of this," said Greg, "and of course I should exempt—"

"Probably you would," she said, not waiting for him to complete his sentence; "and as neither Morris nor I knew of my father's position—for he had deserted us when we were children—the question of money could not have affected Morris's death. The motive was revenge."

"Had he any enemies?"

"Yes"

"Mrs. Brake thinks he had not an enemy in the world," said Greg.

"Lucy Brake can not tell friends from enemies," said Hester, rising, "and her poor idea of the world is limited to Skegs Shore."

Kitty rose with her mistress, but Miss Brake said, quickly:

"Stay here, Kitty. You would like to talk to Mr. Dorward, and the heat is too great here for me. I would prefer to be alone."

"Very well, madam."

She had come into the fresh air complaining of the heat of the house, she was going back to the house with a protest against the closeness of the outer atmosphere—evidently a woman hard to please. Kitty had made a movement to escort her, as usual, but she had waved her back almost impatiently, and then had crossed the lawn. As she entered the house through the open French window by which she had passed from it, Greg ran down by the side of his betrothed, looked at her, and laughed.

"A trifle eccentric, I should say," he remarked

"But a good, earnest, honest lady always, Greg," added Kitty.

"Ah! very likely; but has she come here to talk of murder?" asked Greg, "is the death of her brother always in her thoughts like this? If so, what a cheerful companion she has been to you all these five long years, Kitty?"

"She has seldom spoken to me of her brother."

"Something her disturbed her lately?"

"Her visit to this house, I think," said Kitty; "but I don't know—I can't say."

"And it is not worth while speculating upon it, Kitty," he replied; "it is often a mistake your life or mine, and we are a young couple emerging out of the shade. Guess where I have been this afternoon."

"To Bleathorpe?"

"Why, how do you know?"

Kitty laughed pleasantly at his surprise.

"Mr Woodhatch told me you had ridden over there," she explained.

"Did he tell you what for?"

"No."

"Ah! there's the rub," cried Greg, "and that's like his generous self. Upon my soul, after all, there never was but one John Woodhatch."

"You think so?"

"I do. I am only sorry, Kitty, that his kindness is often so wild, so full of little mysteries and surprises, so grand in design, has often so impossible to realize, so full of complications to the very end," he said, a little ruefully.

"But in the end turning out so well sometimes," added Kitty.

"Not very often; but in our case, a complete success. Is it not?"

"How should I know?" rejoined Kitty, in her natural book manner.

"Everything was against you and me—and yet, here we are, Darby and Joan."

"And who did Darby want at Bleathorpe?" asked Kitty, archly.

"To run the farm which has been taken for us there, our new home, which John Woodhatch places at my disposal, which I am to pay for some day—any day—so that I may not feel too dependent on him now. As if I were not dependent on him for my very life, Kitty, as it is to-day!"

"I am glad you are grateful, Greg," said Kitty, "that you see this man, our benefactor, as I have seen him for myself—a something more than man to me, whom I do not understand, he is so much above me and beyond me."

"This is enthusiasm, Kitty," said Greg; "but I don't blame your warm heart for it, although I don't think John Woodhatch quite faultless. If he were, I should love him all the less."

"What should we have been, you and I, Greg," said Kitty, in a low voice, "without John Woodhatch?"

"Yes," said Greg, looking down, "that's it."

His face changed, and was strangely moved, almost distorted, but it was only for an instant, although Kitty Vanch had perceived it, and wondered at the emotion or pain—she was doubtful which—that had affected him. He was very quick to recover, to become a different Greg—a ready-witted, sharp, humorous young fellow, pleased with himself and her, and with the prospect stretching out before them, the reward for diligence and faith and obedience, implicit obedience, to John Woodhatch. They were more like sweethearts than they had been yesternight; they were more like old friends, with perfect confidence between them, and love, not greatly demonstrative, lying like a jewel at the bottom of their hearts. They did not speak of the past again, but always of the future. The past was sorely dead, and hidden under withered leaves which no adverse wind could stir now. This was a new Greg Dorward, thought Kitty, and yet something like the old—something like him in his acute perception of surroundings, in his total want of fear, in his courage to confront opposition. He was sanguine of his future: he believed in his advancement; he spoke lightly, almost defiantly, of the difficulties in the way of his success; he was in the highest and best of spirits.

John Woodhatch came toward them while they sat there.

"So you two together at last," he said, heartily, "just as in the pictures I have painted."

"Greg has told you we met by accident last night," Kitty hastened to remark.

"Yes; Greg keeps nothing back, and I have forgiven both of you for stealing a march upon me," replied John Woodhatch, and then turning to Greg, he added, "Well, does Bleathorpe please you?"

"Yes, sir, very much."

"You will do well there. It's a little farm, but it is a beginning, and everybody has prospered as Tolland's Farm, Greg. So you two together at last!" he said again, and this time with more exultation; "and the life began on deeper, surely, and with such surroundings, ending very peacefully."

"Thanks to you," murmured Kitty—"to you alone, sir."

"Both repentant," he continued; "both meeting again with new and contrite hearts, with hearts full of hope, and both so young still. It was right I should plan for this as the best thing; the only thing I could do for my poor wards."

Yes, he was very sure it was for the best, and it was satisfactory for him to consider he was sometimes right in his judgment, and not always blundering in the dark. "What will that old skeptic Alec Larcom say to this now?" thought John Woodhatch—he who had for some years prophesied the folly of it all.

BOOK THE THIRD.

APPROACHING THE TRUTH

CHAPTER I.

IN GOOD EARNEST.

To most of the characters of our story there seemed peaceful days at Farm Forlorn after Miss Brake and her companion had "settled down." There were those amongst them believing in the better days now, John Woodhatch and Kate Vanch especially; there were others hopeful, and one or two who saw only the treacherous calm before the storm, and were prepared for the oncoming tempest and the rage of the black night.

Still all was outwardly very peaceful, and they were talking of a marriage in a few weeks, when the young folk thoroughly understood each other; and, indeed John Woodhatch jestingly, "when the harvest was all in and he had more time to attend to 'life's frivolities.'"

Miss Brake had said no more about her brother, but had assumed her usual manner, and was often companionable and chatty, and very much like an ordinary middle-aged lady who is ailing and crotchety and a man or single blessedness. It was only when she was alone, or thought she was alone, that her face took grave shadows to itself, and the dark, deep-set eyes seemed looking straight ahead of her as at something in the distance which dismayed her as a spectre might have done standing in the gray dimness of another world and looking from it toward her.

Mrs. Chadderton had noticed these moods—no one else: but then Mrs. Chadderton was a woman exceedingly observant. The one who had been murdered had been known to one of her that "she was no watchful as a cat": and certain it was that very little passing in Farm Forlorn escaped her vigilance, as a rule.

Still it was a place where those in authority had a right to watch, where it was part of the duty of all trusty subordinates. They were a fair average of quiet men and women in service there at that time, and our story does not touch upon them or their actions; but they were people chosen by John Woodhatch, and brought from various strange places, hard and stony atoms of humanity, who would have gone speedily to the bottom of the gulf without his helping hand and generous encouragement. He was a persevering man, whom failure had not daunted; he had been discouraged very often, he had owned his failures, he had experienced much ingratitude, but his heart had never wholly failed him; and there had always been some little sign, some little green blades peeping up from arid soil to reward this strange man for his work. It was his life's task, and he did not flag by the way: and here was his duty, salutary always, if distressing at times.

And whether successful or a failure, most of these men and women loved him, and seemed very quickly to understand him. Had no some might be in themselves, he was the master over them, striving to make them better, and even the despairing, the irreclaimable, in shifting from him and his help, would cry, "God bless you, sir!" before they were swept away down the dark stream, away from their last chance.

In the calmness—may we not say the false security?—of this present time, as John Woodhatch late one summer's evening in the parlor of Farm Forlorn. Supper had been over half an hour or more, but he had lingered with his guests, and somewhat contrary to his general rule. It was a warm night, with the moonlight streaming on the sea and fen-land lying beyond the farm, and close to the open window facing him sat Hester Brake, almost buried in the big arm-chair which her host had always insisted upon her occupying, and despite her protest at being considered an invalid, from the day of her arrival. At her feet lay Carlo—a dog who had grown a little old, but was still strong and of service, and who had evinced much gratitude for the attention he had lately received from her—and in the background playing draughts sat the engaged couple, happy enough to all outward seeming—happy, one of them at least, in the reality.

Miss Brake had glanced toward them once or twice, as if deeply interested in their movements, and John Woodhatch, smoking his long clay pipe—his one indulgence after work was over for the day—glanced more than once at her.

Suddenly she caught his gaze, leaned toward him slowly, and touched his hand.

"I wish you were not so proud of your work, John," she said, earnestly, "not so sure of its being for the best."

"Two coming marriage?" he said, in the same low tone which she had adopted.

"Yes."

"You have thought with me for some years that it was best. You have been one of the few to encourage the visionary," he said, smiling

"What a time that seems ago—ages!"

"Don't you like Greg on further acquaintance with him?" he asked, curiously.

"I am hard to please, John," was the evasive answer, "and I see—"

"Well?" he said as she paused.

"And I see disappointment may come to you—and them," she concluded. "They are strange lives, after all, and you should be prepared for strange actions to occur."

"Have you anything to tell me?" he asked.

"Not about them," said Miss Brake; "something about myself and others, if you will listen."

"Proceed, Hester."

"I don't mean to pretend to listen and be staring over my head as shoulder at something a hundred miles away—as you do sometimes," she said.

"Do I?" he said, laughing now. "Well, that is very rude of me. Now I am all attention."

"I made my will to-day, John," she said in a lower voice—"a practical and business-like will."

"Without a lawyer?"

"Without much to leave at present," added Miss Brake; "but then there are expectations, and I may be a rich woman before the week is out."

"You have had news from abroad to tell you this?"

"Yes."

"I congratulate you."

"I don't want to be congratulated upon becoming a rich woman," she answered, pensively, "and I don't want you to ask me how I have left my money—though I will tell you, if you like."

"No, I don't want to know. I think I can guess," he said, looking toward Kate Vanch.

"You never guessed right in your life; you are a gigantic mistake, John," she said, still acrimoniously.

"Very well. Then I will not attempt to guess or to argue, only to say this, though," he added, "that if you have forgotten Kitty or your brother's widow—"

"She will be rich enough," said Hester, quickly, as this—"rich as myself."

"—or Alec Larcom—"

"Why, you are dictating to me what to do," cried Miss Brake, "and when it is done already."

"Just allow me to finish," said John, good-temperedly. "I say, if you have forgotten these, or been foolish enough to pitch your money at me, it will be a dead failure."

"And suppose I have pitched it all at you?"

"Then I shall divide it after my own fashion, never touching a penny of it myself."

Miss Brake shrugged her shoulders.

"Why should I bequeath money to a man who is already well off," she said, "and who would be sure to misapply it—who would only surround himself with more offscourings of the jails, and rich his life that way, as Morris's was richer—and lost?"

"There! there! let us change the subject."

"Take care of my will, then—will you?"

And Miss Brake drew a long envelope, sealed with black wax, from the pocket of her dress, and almost pitched it to him. John Woodhatch caught it adroitly, looked at the superscription a little critically, and then put it in the side pocket of his coat.

"I will lock it in my iron safe upstairs along with my own will," he said.

"Thank you."

"You are a prudent woman, Hester; one of the few women strong-minded enough to make a will, and not leave everything afterward at ease and serenity," he said, "for friends and relatives to fight about."

"I have made a dozen wills in my time; I have never flattered myself I am going to live long," she replied, "and I am a weakly woman, with nothing to live for."

"Well, for that matter, what are you going to die for?" asked John Woodhatch, blandly.

Miss Brake did not answer at once. She sat there very still, and with her gaze directed into the dark garden. Presently she said,

"I am not in excellent spirits to-night."

"I feel in good spirits, as if life were less dark and oppressive," he replied; "I feel younger even."

"Why is that?"

"I don't know. There are young people about me, in my home," he said; "perhaps that's it."

"Have you seen Lucy Brake lately?" asked Hester.

"Well, yes, I have;" and John Woodhatch blushed at the inquiry, and the lady facing him saw he was blushing. "Why do you ask?"

"I fancied she might be the reason of your wonderful spirits."

"Probably," said Woodhatch, thoughtfully. "She and her father think of joining us in a few days; I have persuaded them at last."

"Oh! I see. And when shall Kate and I make room for them?"

"You will both remain, of course," he answered, "there is plenty of room at the farm. Besides, I want you all here together—to feel surrounded by my friends who are presently to witness Greg's marriage with Kate."

"Lucy is more strong-minded than I thought to come to this plan," said Hester Brake; "and I admire her courage."

"It has pleasant associations for her as well," replied John Woodhatch. "Her husband was happy here, and loved her here, and this was like home to her."

"Would you make it a home for her now if she would have you for a second husband, John?" asked Miss Brake, unceremoniously.

"Willingly," he said, looking her in the face as she leaned forward to watch the result upon him of her bold questioning.

"It is the old love, then, as strong and as foolish as ever," she said.

"It is the one love of my life. I have never thought to diagnose it. I have always told you the exact truth of it."

"Ay—yes," said Hester Brake, with a long inward sigh, which he did not hear. "And when does she come?"

"Oh, it is not exactly settled; it is only half a promise," he replied. "Soon, I hope."

"Not yet, I hope," whispered Hester Brake almost to herself, although she heard the words and marvelled at them. "Not yet!"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

SURPRISE.

One on me sum long to see a face
With such intensity of strong desire
That their swift soul went seeking it through space,
In eager restlessness that naught could tire?

Then, one good day, lo! at the open door,
The face was there—a glad and sweet surprise—
And they with kisses touched it o'er and o'er,
Catching fresh love from the bright beading eyes.

Did no one ever for a voice so long
That they were aching with a listning pain,
Then start on hear it shedding sudden song
And sweet glad laughter through their home again?

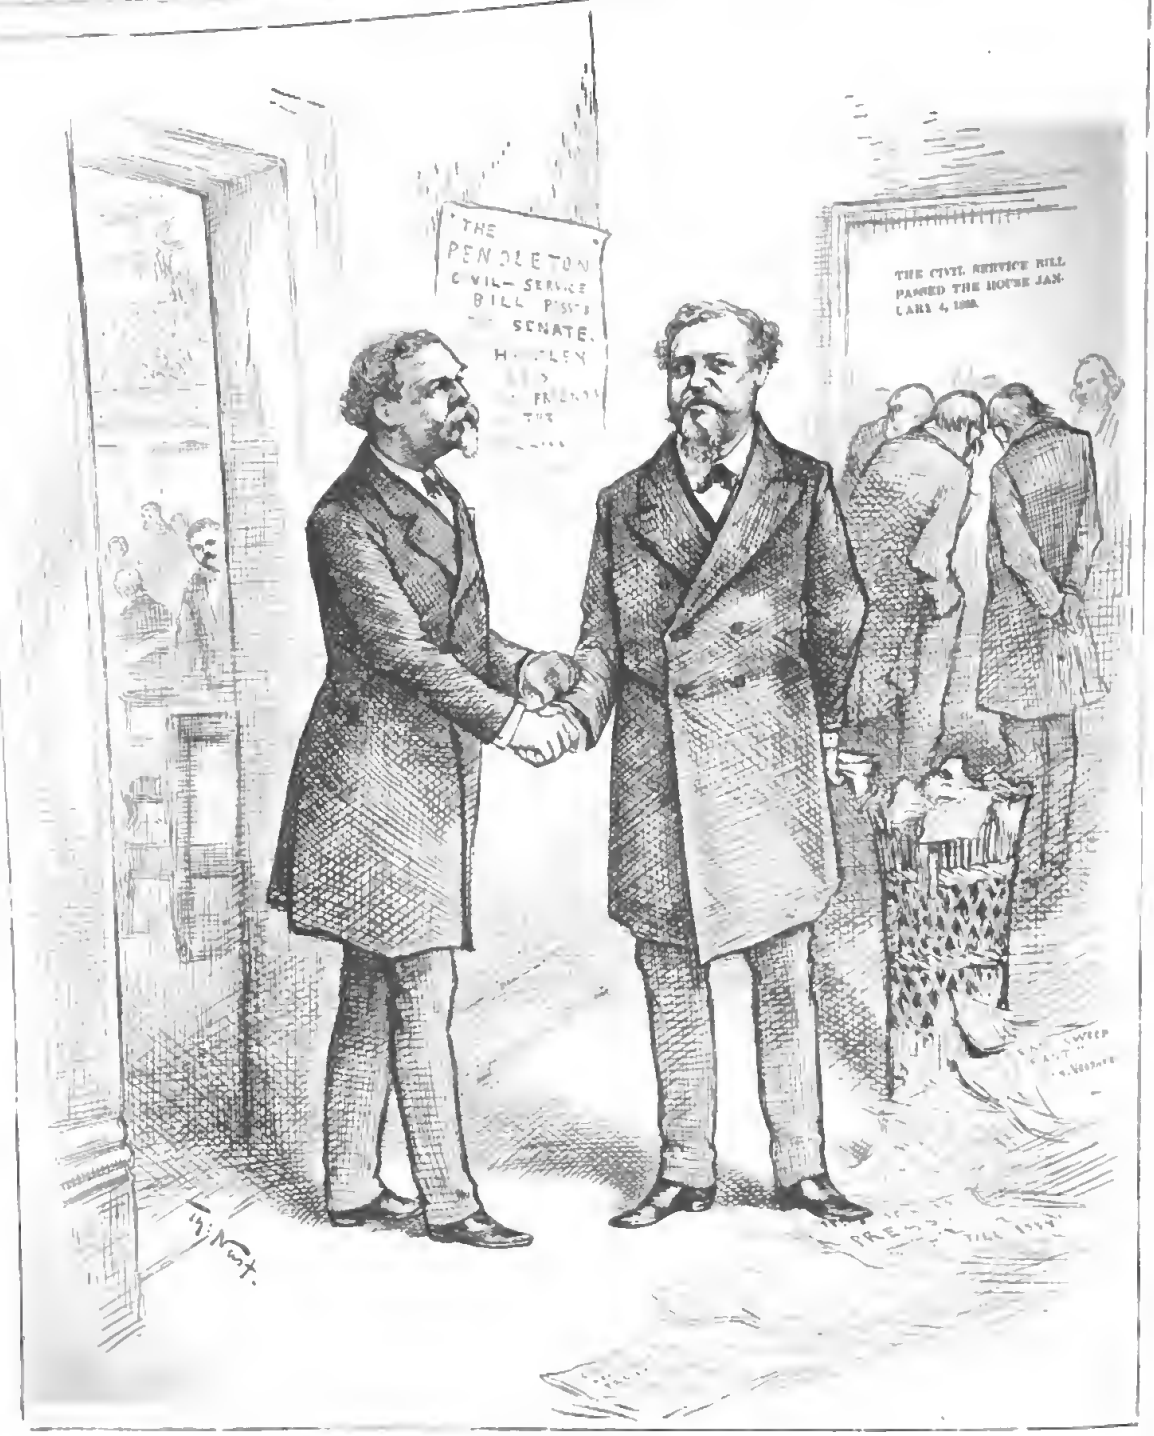
The angels of our lives, who sentinel
Our hearts and homes and ways with guardian eyes,
Rarely to those who watch a joy foretell;
For they delight in giving sweet surprise.

LONDON SWINDLERS.

One of the many dodges of the English sharper is tried on retired military or naval officers. The swindler, says Chambers's Journal, sends a letter recalling some reminiscence of mutual service in an army corps or on board a man-of-war a number of years ago. He mentions his vivid recollection of those happy days, and hints that he has not been overfortunate in worldly affairs. He has been security for a friend, who has failed to meet the bill which he himself has had to pay. The last instalment is nearly due, and he is still eight or ten pounds short, while the consequences will be serious if the money is not forth-coming. Can he presume so far upon the memory of old times as to ask a small loan to tide him over the difficulty? This type of swindler possesses more than an average education and his information regarding the antecedents of his dupe is curiously accurate. It is probably gathered from some old tar or discharged soldier, many of whom are extremely garrulous regarding their favorite officers.

An ingenious fraud has lately been practised in London. A tall, well-dressed man, apparently a city merchant on his way home from business, is seen talking on the street to a man in workman's dress, who carries a basket and some tools. The "merchant" presents some well-dressed passenger, and tells him the "mechanic's" tale of want of employment and family distress. He adds that he has satisfied himself of the truth of the story, and is about to give a trifle; will the gentleman join in giving a small sum to relieve deserving necessity? The appareat respectability of the voucher often succeeds where a common begging petition would fail, and the person accosted generally gives something. A gentleman who had given a small sum on both swindlers issue from a public-house some time after. Of course on seeing him they decamped.

A clever dodge has lately come to light, which shows how thoroughly the swindler understood those on whom he was to operate, and forms a curious commentary on the relations between servants and tradesmen. A man having the appearance of a gentleman's servant called on several tradesmen in a fashionable part of London, asking them to come to certain house for orders for different classes of goods, at the same time throwing out a suggestion that a small gratuity for himself would be acceptable, and might not be lost by the tradesman in a distribution of further orders. In a number of instances small sums were given; but when the shop-men attended at the place named they found their services were not required, and that the small fees had flowed into the pocket of some clever rascal



ALL HONOR TO SENATOR PENDLETON.

PENDLETON TO HAWLEY (in strict confidence). "I thank you for your help and congratulations, but find myself in a peculiar position. Your party supports me, while my party gives me the cold shoulder."

THE REV. TITUS M. COAN, D.D.

THE remarkable man, whose death occurred at his home in Hilo, Sandwich Islands, on December 1, was one of the oldest missionaries in point of service rendered that ever bore the cross to heathen lands. He had served in the Sandwich Islands as a missionary almost without intermission for a period of nearly forty-eight years, and he was regarded by the natives with a feeling of affection and veneration. The venerable missionary was attacked by a severe stroke of paralysis on September 16 last. He rallied from this attack, and became so much improved that he was able to take daily exercise in the open air up to the very day of his death. His funeral services were held on the morning of Sunday, December 3, in the native church at Hilo, the services being conducted in both the Hawaiian and English languages. He was in his eighty-second year at the time of his death.

In his interesting account of a visit to the Sandwich Islands in 1873, Mr CHARLES NORDHOFF gives the following pleasant sketch of the life and work of Dr Coan:

"And in Hilo, when you go to visit the volcano, you will find Dr Coan, one of the brightest and loveliest spirits of them all, the story of whose life in the remote island whose apostle he was is as wonderful and as touching as that of any of the earlier apostles, and shows what great works unyielding faith and love can do in redeeming a savage people. When Dr. and Mrs. COAN came to the island of Hawaii its shores and woods were populous, and through their labors thousands of men and women were instructed in the truths of Christianity, inducted into civilized habits of life, and finally brought into the Church. As you sail along the green coast of Hawaii from its northern point to Hilo, you will be surprised at the number of quaint little white churches which mark the distances almost with the regularity of mile-stones: if, later, you ride through this district or the one south of Hilo, you will see that for every church there is also a school house: you will see native children reading and writing as well as our own at home. you may hear them singing tunes familiar in our own Sunday-schools. you will see the native man and woman sitting down to read their newspaper at the close of day; and if you could talk with them, you would find they knew almost as much about our late war as you do, for they took an intense interest in the war of the rebellion. And you must remember that when, less than forty years ago, Dr and Mrs Coan came to Hilo, the people were naked savages, with no church and but one school-house in the district, without printed books or knowledge of reading. They flocked to hear the Gospel. Thousands removed from a distance to Hilo, where, in their rapid way, they built up a large town, and kept up surely the strangest 'protracted meeting' ever held: and going back to their homes after many months, they took with them knowledge and zeal to build up Christian churches and schools of their own. Over these De Coan has presided these many years, not only preaching regularly on Sundays and during the week in the large native church at Hilo, and in two or three neighboring churches, but visiting the more distant churches at intervals, to examine and instruct the members, and keep them all on the right track. He has seen a region very populous when he first came to it decrease until it has now many more deserted and ruined house-places than inhabited dwellings; but also he has seen a great population turned from darkness to light, a great part of it following his own blameless and loving life as an example, and very many living to old age steadfast and zealous Christians."

SPEAKER CHAPIN.

The gentleman from Kings County who has just been chosen Speaker of the Lower House of the New York Legislature is among the youngest of those who have held that distinguished place. Senator Pitts, of Oldtown, was Speaker in 1867 at the age of twenty-eight, the present incumbent is less than thirty-five. He was born at South Hadley, Massachusetts, March 6, 1848, and belongs to an old and honored family, whose ancestry in the Connecticut Valley can be traced back more than two hundred and fifty years. After attending various public and private schools he was admitted to Williams College in 1865, from which institution he graduated in the class of 1869. After leaving college Mr. Chapin studied for two years at the Harvard Law School, graduating in 1872, in which year he was admitted to the New Hampshire bar. He was admitted to the New York bar in 1873, and immediately began the practice of his profession in the city, taking up his residence in the Seventh Ward of Brooklyn. He is a director in the Manhattan Beach Improvement Company. His politics have always been Democratic, but he never until the fall of 1881 allowed his name to be used in connection with a public office. He was then chosen to the Assembly over Parmenas Bates, his Republican opponent, in a district previously very largely Republican, by a majority of nearly 1,200. In the Assembly of last year he made a most creditable reputation, having been chairman of the special committee to investigate insurance receiverships, and a member of the Judiciary Committee. He was re-elected in the last election, receiving 9181 votes against 8353 cast for his opponent. He was chosen Speaker by a vote of 84 to 41.

Mr. Chapin is described by the New York Herald as being tall and slim, with a pale, impassive face, regular features, and jet-black hair. He has a cool, quiet, imperturbable manner, and gives the impression that nothing less than an earthquake or the explosion of a ton of dynamite would disturb his equipoise. He talks in an undertone, with slowness, precision, and deliberation, and appears to weigh his words carefully before giving them utterance. While his face is not full, neither is it thin, but long and oval and fairly well rounded. He has an intellectual, student-like appearance, and his habitual expression is one of gravity and great decorum.

ULTIMA THULE

Stretching along the coast of the Arctic Ocean from the Atlantic to the White Sea, lies the barren and forbidding country known as Lapland, inhabited by a semi-barbarous race of men, lithely and courageous. In personal appearance the Lapp resembles the Finn, having a large head, short neck, small grayish eyes, long thin legs, and projecting abdomen, the latter the result of improper or insufficient food. Like the Finn, he lives by fishing and hunting. A very interesting account of a visit to these people is given in Paul du Chaillu's Land of the Midnight Sun. He found them frank and simple, but not very pleasant to live with, on account of their exceedingly primitive habits and rude dwellings. There is a tradition that the Swedes and Lapps were originally brothers, when a storm came on, the Swedes put up a board and sought shelter under it, while the Lapps took to a tent; and ever since the Lapps have lived in tents and the Swedes in houses.

The Lapps have been driven northward by their southern neighbors into the bleak and barren land which they now inhabit. Their number is steadily though slowly decreasing, partly from the terrible hardships of life on the severe winter, which lasts for nine months, during two of which they are entirely deprived of the light of the sun, and partly by emigration to milder climates.

The Lapps, although nominally converted to Christianity, are still prone to forms of heathenism and old superstitions. They believe in supernaturally wise men, called noaids, who are supposed to be the medium between the human and the Divine, and to possess unlimited power over the spirit world. Some of these noaids are skilled in sleight of hand, and by their tricks are able to impose on the credulity of the people. They are believed to have the power of selling favorable winds to fishermen, and securing good luck to hunters. They are also the "mechanic men" of the Lapps, and share with the picture of the Madonna, which is to be found in every household, their religious reverence.

New-York Tribune.

For 1883.

STRONG, CLEAN, ENTERPRISING.

THE LARGEST CIRCULATION AMONG THE BEST PEOPLE.

The first aim of THE TRIBUNE is to be the best general news and family paper in America. Its columns are full of what is most worth reading, and they are clean, wholesome, able, and entertaining. Dr. Townshend, of Ohio, said in any of THE TRIBUNE that it contains more of what one wants to know, and less of what one doesn't want to know, than any paper with which he was acquainted. THE TRIBUNE has its own telegraph line to Washington, it uses the cables freely, and scours the world for the news, printing all that is useful. It publishes the news fearlessly and accurately. It tells a tale is worth it in detail. The rest is put into bright short paragraphs. Its contents are fresh, choice, varied, and thoroughly unobjectionable in every respect. Keeping an abundant patronage from every part of the land, having the largest circulation among the best people, occupying the finest newspaper building in the world, and equipped with the most modern appliances for carrying on its business, THE TRIBUNE finds itself well prepared to make all its editions thoroughly entertaining and valuable. It proposes to make them so.

THE TRIBUNE is the organ of no individual, of no faction or clique, and of no interest adverse to the public good. It knows no service other than that of the people. It believes the well-being of the country will be best preserved by keeping its Government in Republican hands. But it does not believe in Ring Rule, Bossism, or corruption in office. It has done hard work, and taken great risks, in efforts to purify the Republican party. It expects to continue in that course, wherever or whenever this may seem needful—not doubting that this is the true road to a worthy Republican success in 1884.

The Semi-Weekly and Weekly contain the cream of the Daily, and in addition thereto strong features for the home circle and for farmers. The Weekly is the universal favorite of our substantial country population. It is the best and cheapest paper in the country, containing something for old and young, and being especially strong in its agricultural departments.

Every year THE TRIBUNE offers to subscribers a few premium books of standard merit. The terms are usually so arranged that either the paper or the book is a gift to the subscriber. For 1883, THE TRIBUNE offers a new and particularly attractive premium in the standard medical work, "WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN OF MEDICINE, HYGIENE, AND SURGERY," written by eminent physicians of New York and Philadelphia, published by the well-known house of William Wood & Co., to 2 vols., containing 819 and 962 pp., and sold for the invariable price of $10. This work will pay for itself in any family in a month. It is given with the Weekly for 5 years for $10. A full description of the premiums of THE TRIBUNE will be sent upon application. They include Chambers' Encyclopædia, Ridpath's entertaining History of the United States, Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries, and a Concordance to the Bible. Address

YOU WILL FIND NEW AND INTERESTING INFORMATION

Scattered through The Frank Siddalls Soap Advertisement every week it appears.

In our last advertisement we told you what Madame DEMOREST, Judge TURNER, The Detroit Free Press, and the N. Y. Witness think of The Frank Siddalls Soap. This week we present a few more opinions.

THE Chicago Western Rural

The champion of the farmer's rights and his protective agency begins advertisers, says:—

That Frank Siddall will do as he advertises, that The Frank Siddalls Soap has really wonderful merit, and that it should be tried by every farmer and farmer's wife throughout the land.

THE N. Y. Christian at Work

(A leading New York undenominational paper; a standard of moral and religious literature)

Strongly backs the claims made for The Frank Siddalls Soap endorsing the finest Soap of modern times:—The Christian at Work was the first paper in the great metropolis to editorially endorse every one of the various claims.

The Philadelphia Times
(McCLURE'S TIMES)

(An Authority on politics throughout the United States, and the leading —Reform Journal of Philadelphia)—

Endorses in its columns —Frank Siddall—Frank Siddalls Soap— and Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes, and all the claims made in this advertisement.

THE BOSTON PILOT

One of the most valuable advertising mediums in New England, with a circulation exceeding that of any other Catholic Journal in the United States and an authority throughout America and Europe, says:—

The announcements of The Frank Siddalls Soap are a welcome addition to the columns of "The Pilot," as it is one of the few advertised articles that comes fully up to every claim made for it, and every man and woman should give it a trial.

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the Skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day! Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as it never were! No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White for a year away for years! The Soap Positively guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water is coarse or has to be carried far, remember that with The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing, a few buckets of water are enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New! The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened! A girl and 12 can easily do a large wash without even being tired! And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes—it is the only Soap that leaves the dishes Sweet and White, and the Only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag dont blame your servants, if it not them fault, for you have given them soap made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish-rag, as the Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice! Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE-CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paint, Window and Mirrors, Wire glasses, Goblets, and all Glass Vessels; ordinary soap, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass, while The Frank Siddalls Soap is the most elegant thing for this purpose that can be used.

For Washing Bed-clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing Linens used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat or be troubled with sores of any kind when nothing but The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, the ingredients being so pure and mild.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—the acid it contains would them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease, and without causing a scratch, the soap does not have to be rinsed off

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Lecturer, the Barber of the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army, and the Navy, will all reap great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting Lather is unsurpassed from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost incredible; the face never burns or smarts, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how closely shaved, and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet-smelling.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE:—It washes freely in hard water, and a little goes a long ways; remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Saws, Hails, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No house is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and restoring it soft and pliable, while for washing carriage and car windows, cleaning the running-gear and bodies of the carriages, it is without a rival; by its use paint and varnish will last longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

IT IS ELEGANT for washing Printers' Rollers, for washing the Ink from Type, Electrotypes, etc., and for washing Printing Ink from the hands.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient, its importance is becoming more and more widely known and appreciated, and it is rapidly superseding Imported Castile and similar soaps for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE-NAILS

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—we tried all yours its superiority over cotton-wool

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns; for washing Chafed places or Infants and Adults; for use by persons suffering with Salt Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face, and for children afflicted with Scaly Incrustations, it is without any of the injurious effects so often experienced when any other Soap is used, while for washing the bowels it is a most valuable aid to the Physician, by the thoroughness with which it removes the nebulations from the skin that would otherwise tend to counteract the action of his medicines by closing up the pores, and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for washing sores or the feet, caused by walking or wearing tight shoes. Always have plenty of the lather on—dont rinse the lather off. For washing Graduate Measures and Mortars it is better than anything else.

Remember, The Frank Siddalls Soap is here publicly guaranteed to do everything claimed in this Advertisement, and to contain nothing to injure the most tender skin, the most delicate colors, or the finest fabrics.

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All perfumes are injurious to the skin; The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients, that is always pleasant, even as cocoanut oil, if never leaves any odor on the Skin; the face never has any of the unpleasant gloss that other soaps produce; it should always be used for washing the hands and face of those troubled with Chapped Skin; a child will not thread better to face washed when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, as it does not cause the eyes to smart like the drenched intense sting that even Imported Castile Soap causes. It leaves the skin Soft and Smooth.

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it.

A little on the tooth-brush makes the mouth, teeth and gums perfectly clean. It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath, and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted for hotel use with the hard water of the West and in Lake Water.

Persons who despise a musty sponge or wash-rag will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Whenever a sponge has a disagreeable smell, it is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soap that is such a favorite with you; it is the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash-rag sweet and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any occasion to expose it to the air or sun.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing; plenty of the rich, white lather should be left in the hair (not combed out); it entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic, Bay Rum, Bandoline, Pomade, or any hair dressing. Used this way it rem ves dandruff, the hair will not collect dust, and there will not be any Oiling of the Scalp.—Coat Collars, Hat Linings and Neck-wear will keep clean much longer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior in Water or Ammonia for cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing grease spots, etc., and is guaranteed not to injure the garment.

ODD USES—QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

Eminent Physicians claim that skin diseases, such as Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., are caused by Soap made from rancid grease; use The Frank Siddalls Soap and avoid all such troubles.

Artificial Teeth and Artificial Eyes will retain their original brilliancy unimpaired when kept washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap.

Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes and Photographers' plates without a possibility of scratching them, while it is being used with the most gratifying results in Schools of Design, for washing brushes used by the students.

The hands of those at farm work, when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, will not chap from hoeing corn, driving teams, and other out-door employment, but will restore an home-made or other Soap (not even Castile) must be used.

Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles—

Wash your Dog with The Frank Siddalls Soap; leave plenty of the lather in his hair, and you will be surprised at the improvement, a dog washed occasionally with this Soap will be too clean to harbor fleas.

Use it for taking grease spots out of nice carpets and for cleaning rag carpets. Use it for wiping off oilcloths, linoleum, &c.—IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT, and they will last much longer Use it for cleaning garments of every description. It is better than Benzine or Marl-horn for cleaning clothing, and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

Milk Pans and all Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be as clean and sweet as new, and do not require scalding or putting in the sun.

It also THOROUGHLY removes the smell from the hands after milking

☞ And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel, Ladylike, FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions; any child over 12 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them.

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used, NOT EVEN TO HEAT THE WASH-WATER, and as the wash-water must only be lukewarm, a small bottle holds enough for a large wash. Where water is scarce or has to be carried for The Frank Siddalls Soap will prove a great saving.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful Housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in the Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle THE FIRST TIME, no matter how cold it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last rinse soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

A large dissolves a small piece of Soap to the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound, dont use Borax, Ammonia, or any other Soap on any of the wash.

FIRST—Dip one of the garments in a tub of lukewarm water; draw it out on a wash board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to waste it, being particular not to rub counting any of the soiled places.

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as a piece is rolled when it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After making the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board and run just will soap out; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DONT use any more Soap, DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DONT wash them through two suds. If the wash-water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold, add some hot water on the kitchen fire.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, and is for the PURPOSE OF GETTING THE SUDS OUT, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY RINSE SUFFICIENTLY WILL SHOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

Next, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold: Use both or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue water UNTIL THE WATER LOOKS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, stirring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT BE ADDING OF BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE the BRIGHTER.

MR. CLARK RUSSELL'S SERIAL STORY.

A correspondent inquires what has become of MR. CLARK RUSSELL'S serial story, "A Sea Queen," which was advertised to begin in HARPER'S WEEKLY at the commencement of the present year. The facts are these: We had made a positive engagement with MR. RUSSELL'S London publishers to begin the story at the time specified, simultaneously with an English journal; but, after our announcement had been published, an arrangement was made, without notice to us, for its commencement as a serial in England in November last. As we were unable at that late date to alter our own arrangements, and as the conductors of the English journal refused to postpone the publication of the story, we were compelled to relinquish it.

THE FIRST STEP.

THE year just ended completed a half-century since the passage of the Reform Bill of 1832, in England, and a paper by Professor DICEY in the Fortnightly Review for January recalls the tone and the words of the opposition to that wise and timely measure. Professor DICEY'S paper may be read with great profit by the opponents of the reform bill which has just passed Congress. The Duke of Wellington, Lord ELDON, Mr. CROKER, and other Tories saw in an increase of the number of voters only a war upon property, the overthrow of the government, and the ruin of the nation. Reform was stigmatized as impracticable, visionary, and needless. The existing system was defended as a natural development, and so fitting and excellent that it could not be touched without fatal injury. The Whigs retorted that they also shared the apprehension for the fate of the country, but that the real ground of fear lay in a dogged persistence in abuses and wrongs against which the best opinion of England earnestly protested. In one of his famous speeches in support of the bill MACAULAY said that he favored it not only because it would improve English institutions, but because it tended to preserve them. The opposition to the civil service reform bill in the country has been inexpressibly feeble in comparison with that in England to the bill of 1832. There has been a great deal of silly talk about an aristocracy of office holders, and fraud, and sham, and sentimentality, and party advantage, and personal aims. Even Mr EATON, who went to Washington at the request of the New York Association to aid the passage of the bill by his familiarity with the bill itself and with the general subject, has been accused of lobbying a bill creating an office for his own advantage. It would be hard to find a lower depth of twaddle. Such talk is the mere mouthing of futile hostility.

The friends of reform, however, will not forget that the bill merely begins the work, and that the same spirit of hostility will dog every step of the movement. The operation of the bill will be watched, and in every [illegible] will be maliciously misrepresented. Every [illegible] event in the service will be attributed to the [illegible] system, every defaulter and incompetent of [illegible] employé will be cited as a pupil of the new [illegible] of reform. Whatever goes wrong will be in [illegible] of reform, whatever goes right, in spite [illegible] This is an old form of demagogism, but it need [illegible] no case. The bill which has passed Congress [illegible] of system the efficiency of which, [illegible] such enterprises must depend largely upon [illegible] whom it is intrusted. The rules which by authority of President HAYES were adopted in the New York Custom-house and Post-office have been singularly successful in their results, because they have been administered by intelligent men who honestly believed in them, and meant to carry them out in their own spirit. This success in the two greatest offices of their kind in the country was one of the most powerful arguments for the reform bill. The practicability of the system was already established beyond cavil. The sneerers at visionary statesmanship were silenced, as Sir BOYLE ROCHE would have said, before they opened their mouths. The preparation of the bill was simply to apply to a few other offices what has been proved to be so effective in these two, and to extend the system further, only under the direction of the President. The bill, of course, neither increases nor diminishes the powers of the President which are defined in the Constitution. But it gives him the lawfully declared moral support of Congress, and it is a declaration that members of Congress, who have been the chief obstructors of reform, will no longer obstruct. The action of Congress at once disposes of the objection, which has hitherto paralyzed the progress of practical reform, that in promoting it the President was recreant to his party, and undertaking what the country did not demand.

We repeat that the new bill is but a first step toward a complete and exhaustive measure of reform. It is, as we have said, a beginning. There are, in round numbers, about 100,000 persons who may be called in a general sense officers of the government. Of these only 10,000 are subjected to the provisions of the bill. It applies, after a delay of six months for proper classification, to the clerkships in all the departments at Washington, and to custom-houses and post offices in which fifty or more clerks are employed. There are not more than thirty such offices in the country. The operation of the bill at the outset is thus limited that the system may be easily and completely under the control and survey of the Commission, and that every advantage may be taken of the results of actual trial and experience. There must be a board of examiners for every department in Washington, and at each of the offices in the Union to which the bill at once applies. This will make a total of about thirty-five boards, which will be under the superintendence of the Commission. The initiation and the extension of the system will depend entirely upon the President. The bill simply authorizes him, with the consent of the Senate, to appoint the Commission and to remove its members at pleasure. The Commission will draft rules, which will be valid only with the President's approval. When adopted, they will be obligatory upon all officers concerned, and after the lapse of six months from the passage of the bill no officer or clerk included in the rules approved by the President can be lawfully appointed except in accordance with their provisions, until the law is repealed or the rules are changed. In a word, the bill assumes, as all such bills must assume, the good faith of those who enforce it. A President hostile to the bill could appoint a hostile Commission, which could frustrate its purpose. But they could not do this without drawing upon themselves the wrath of the country. Such hostility upon the part of President ARTHUR would be very surprising, after his frank declarations upon the subject, and no future President will be anxious to court public indignation by renouncing a reform which will have justified itself wherever it shall have been fairly tried, as it has already justified itself in the New York Post-office and Custom-house.

THE PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

THE question of the Presidential succession which Mr HOAR has brought up in the Senate, was one of those that engaged the attention of Congress soon after the inauguration of the government. It was considered in the House of Representatives in the First Congress, in January, 1791, and the first officer of the United States who was proposed as the proper successor to the President and Vice-President in case of disability was the Secretary of State. This is also the suggestion of Senator HOAR. It was at once said, however, that the vacancy contemplated would not happen once in a hundred years. Mr BURKE, of South Carolina, indeed, said that a gentleman skilled in the doctrine of chances had informed him that the contingency would not happen more than once in eight hundred and forty years. But still it was a contingency, and besides the Secretary of State there were proposed the Chief Justice, the President of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr MADISON favored the designation of the Secretary of State, and it was observed that the friends of Mr. JEFFERSON all took the same view. But the reasons of the preference were, nevertheless, wholly impersonal, and in March, 1792, the present law was passed, designating the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House for the succession, and providing for an election to fill the vacancy.

The defect of this arrangement is that the government may be left without a head. This is not a merely illusory chance, for after the death of President GARFIELD there was a long time during which the death of Vice-President ARTHUR, who succeeded to the functions of the Presidency, would have deprived the country of a Chief Executive, as there was then no Speaker of the House nor President pro tem. of the Senate. The Constitution prescribes that in case of inability of both the President and Vice-President Congress may declare by law the officer who shall discharge the Chief Executive functions. This is a general discretion to be exercised with just regard to the character of the office and the necessities of the situation. The guiding principle should be that the officer designated be one whose succession would assure the country that the general policy which it had approved in the election of President and Vice-President would be carried out. None of the officers who were first named for the succession, or who are suggested now, are elected by the people. The Chief Justice, the Secretaries, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House are all either appointed by the Executive or elected by a branch of the Legislature. In respect of popular election, therefore, they are all alike. But the Chief Justice is appointed by the Constitution to preside when the President is tried under impeachment. It can not be supposed, therefore, that the Constitution could have contemplated him as an alternative President. The President of the Senate would still be the Senator of a State, and as such could vote upon his own nominations. The Speaker of the House might be opposed to the views and policy of the President.

For these and similar reasons the better selection would be that of the cabinet in ordre, and for the reason that the President properly calls to the cabinet leading and conspicuous representatives of the views with which he is identified, and which the country by electing him has approved. This has been the rule, and if there have been exceptions, the tendency of the bill introduced by Mr HOAR would be to diminish the exceptions, because every member of the cabinet would be a possible President. The question of the succession ought to be settled without delay, and the plan of Senator HOAR is the simplest and most reasonable that has been proposed. The bill reported by Mr HOAR passed the Senate by a vote of 40 to 13—a very significant majority; and the question of ordering an election was settled by a provision that the acting President under the law shall immediately call a special session of Congress, if Congress be not sitting at the time of his accession to the office, and it will then be for Congress to decide whether to order an election. The law designating the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House as acting President is repealed. But the bill should be amended in the House by a definite provision as to election. The necessary excitement of the situation contemplated by the bill should not be increased by a debate upon an election.

GENERAL FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

WHATEVER may be the final decision of Congress in the case of General FITZ-JOHN PORTER, there is no doubt that the long debate has deeply affected public opinion, and favorably to General PORTER. To this impression his own attitude has largely contributed. In the midst of the war, twenty years ago, he was practically convicted by a military court of treason, and of the most odious form, for no crime can be more detestable than that of the general who betrays his country upon the field which he might have saved. If General PORTER was really guilty, he deserved to be ranked with BENEDICT ARNOLD. His life was spared, but the infamy of the conviction remained for him and his children and his name. But he has not submitted to the disgrace. Instead of seeking to bury it and himself in obscurity and neglect, he has steadily and boldly challenged a re-opening of the whole case, when a confirmation of the judgment would have been damning. Asserting his innocence, he has appealed to fresh evidence only accessible after the war, and invited the closest scrutiny from administrations that could not be prejudiced in his favor.

President GRANT, persuaded of his guilt, would not authorize a revision of the case. But President HAYES summoned a board of inquiry. General PORTER gladly confronted the risk of a deliberate confirmation to peace of the judgment recorded amid the hot passions of war, and after the most exhaustive and minute scrutiny by men of the purest patriotism and impartiality, the verdict was reversed, and the immense injustice to General PORTER was declared. Ex-President GRANT, carefully restudying the case, acknowledged the propriety of the decision, and nothing in his career is nobler than his frank declaration of his error, and the manly urgency with which he has sought to procure the righting of what he believes to be a great wrong. The mass of evidence in the case is enormous. Few persons have read it. Still fewer have the knowledge and experience which are essential to an authoritative opinion upon it. It will not be disputed that General GRANT is as capable a judge of the case as can be found, and his opinion and its reasons, stated briefly and strongly in a recent paper in the North American Review, have naturally and properly greatly impressed the country.

General LOGAN, with unquestionable sincerity and skill, has presented in the Senate the counter-argument. But in the midst of the conflict of testimony and assertion much that is emphasized as conclusive of guilt is to many minds really conclusive of innocence, and it is certain that any one who reads the evidence and the arguments must be amazed at the stigma which has been cast upon General PORTER. That there was a McCLELLAN or West Point "ring" in the army is very probable, and that General PORTER and many other officers may have had and may have even expressed an unfavorable opinion of General POPE is quite possible. But this is very far from a deliberate disobedience and neglect upon the field which was the betrayal of the country, and the personal dishonor and degradation of the treacherous officer. It is disgraceful that the question of justice to General PORTER should occasion any form of party contest, and restoration to rank and pay to a consideration entirely subordinate to the correction of an immense injustice. The question for Congress is simple. Was FITZ-JOHN PORTER unjustly convicted? If he was, the disgrace of twenty years, the prime of his life, can never be made up to him, and what restoration is still possible an honest and just people will not begrudge.

A THRIFTY ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

WE called attention last summer to the singular circumstances of an advertisement announcing the connection of Mr. FRANK HATTON, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, with a Western newspaper for which postmasters were requested to act as agents. This advertisement was printed in the official Postal Guide, and whatever its intention, it had presumably the effect of persuading postmasters whose terms were about expiring that the chances of reappointment would not be diminished by zeal in procuring subscriptions for the paper in which the First Assistant Postmaster-General was interested.

Another incident of the same kind has just been reported. Every Republican member of Congress recently found upon his desk a package of lithographed letters, with a request from First Assistant Postmaster-General HATTON that the members would sign them and return them to him. These letters were addressed to the postmasters in the districts of the various members, requesting them to secure subscriptions to a Washington newspaper which has recently passed under the control of First Assistant Postmaster-General HATTON. The letters, which were provided with the heading of the House of Representatives, would thus have appeared to be a spontaneous request from the member of Congress to the local postmaster, whom he practically appoints, to tout for the newspaper of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who could remove him. This is at least a thrifty proceeding. But if the facts are as reported from Washington, including a copy of the letter, it is a proceeding into which the President might well inquire.

A FOREGONE CONCLUSION.

THE conduct of Mayor EDSON has already justified the Citizens' movement of last autumn. His first serious duty was the nomination of several important officers, and his discharge of that duty has been universally censured. Every leading journal in the city, of every shade of politics, on the morning that the nominations were announced, united in condemning the Mayor's action. One of the journals which supported his election most strenuously said that he had been tried and failed, and that he had committed political suicide before his term was a fortnight old.

The journals agreed in the view that the Mayor had shown himself to be the mere agent of those who bargained for his nomination. But this was urged last autumn as the reason for not supporting a nomination so made. When a wholly inexperienced man like Mr. EDSON accepts a nomination to the Mayoralty of New York under the present charter, a nomination which is the result of a trade between notorious political managers, it may be safely assumed that he will become their passive instrument unless his character and ambition are such as to lead him to invite a stormy conflict by defying them and aiming at an independent administration for the public benefit.

This was what Mr. CAMPBELL would certainly have aimed at, and it was precisely what there was no reason to suppose that Mr. EDSON would undertake. He may have disappointed those who voted for him, but he has not disappointed those who, for no personal reasons, opposed his election. Mr CAMPBELL had proved his ability, his courage, and his independence in the management of municipal affairs, and the circumstances of his nomination pledged him to the course that he preferred and that his supporters desired. The lesson will not be lost. A radically reforming pope is almost as impossible as a truly independent mayor nominated by the bargain of political factions. If the government of the city is ever to become what the best citizens of all parties wish it to be, the best citizens of all parties must unite in electing it.

NAVAL OFFICER BURT.

THE Philadelphia Press suggests that Naval Officer BURT of that port would be a singularly efficient member of the Civil Service Commission contemplated by the reform bill. Of that there can be no question. Mr. BURT is one of the most sincere, intelligent, and able friends of the reformed system. The success of that system at the Custom-house has been one of the most powerful arguments for the PENDLETON bill, and that success is largely due to Mr. BURT. He has been most efficiently aided by the Board of Examiners, but his clear comprehension of the subject was of the greatest service in establishing the system. Undoubtedly his knowledge of the practical details of the public service and his long experience would make his services upon the Commission of very great value.

But they would be of so much if not of higher value in the position that he holds. It is in a few great offices, of which the New York Custom-house is the chief, that the system is to be first applied, and it is indispensable that it should be intrusted at the outset to officers in the service who have both the convictions and the practical knowledge and efficiency of Mr. BURT. It is from the skepticism, indifference, and secret hostility of persons in office that the new system will have most to fear, and the more friends it has in the service, the more honestly and satisfactorily it will be enforced.

It would be very much easier to select a fitting member of the Commission than to replace Mr. BURT as Naval Officer; and if he should be replaced by any merely political or factional successor, his nomination for the Commission would be less an earnest of the good faith of the Executive than the appointment of such a successor would be evidence of unchanged attachment to the old system.

WILLIAM A. SEAVER.

MR. WILLIAM A. SEAVER, one of our associates in the WEEKLY, died very suddenly a few days since of pneumonia. He was a singularly genial companion, and the friend of many distinguished persons, who highly valued his social talent and sympathy. In other days he had been the editor of a daily paper, and had taken his part in political contests. But of late years he had cultivated altogether the literary and relations which unite instead of alienating, and when discussion became warm, his tongue was silent. Mr SEAVER was a man of pleasant literary tastes, which he indulged with the zeal of an excellent library, and by correspondence with noted authors. He was a man of ready humor, observant and affable, and his sudden death will be sincerely regretted.

EX SENATOR MORRILL.

LOT M. MORRILL, whose name was very familiar as that of a late Senator from Maine, has just died at the age of seventy. Mr. MORRILL had been nearly thirty years in public life as a member of the State Legislature, as Governor, as Senator, as Secretary of the Treasury, and finally as Collector of Portland. He was formerly a Democrat, but he left the Democratic party because of its pro-slavery tendencies, and he has been a steadfast Republican ever since. During the war Mr. MORRILL well represented the sturdy patriotism of his State, and his views of reconstruction and of finance were those of the soundest Republicanism. His native shrewdness and his luminous talent made him a most serviceable member of the Senate, and his name belongs to that group of Maine men eminent during the stormy years of twenty years ago, and which includes FESSENDEN, WASHBURN, HAMLIN, and BLAINE.

A DANGEROUS ABYSS.

ON the 8th of January a feast in commemoration of General JACKSON took place in Boston, at which the Democratic politicians present nominated General BUTLER for the Presidency. As a serious spectacle nothing could well be droller than that of ex-Governor SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island, unconscious that the country is drifting toward a dangerous abyss, and that General BUTLER is the best man of all to bring it into a safe haven. Mr. JONAS FRENCH, who seems to be a kind of prophet of BUTLER, as to speak, declared, with the cheap clap-trap which is so familiar upon such occasions, that "General JACKSON never forgot what he owed to the people, and that General BUTLER never will." Did General WASHINGTON ever forget what he owed to the people? Certainly the people will never forget what they owe to General WASHINGTON. Nor, indeed, will they forget what they owed to General BUTLER at New Orleans. But it will hardly help him to obtain the votes that he especially desires.

The General himself glorified JACKSON, and said that he adopted his maxim, not, indeed, that to the victor belong the spoils, but that the government belonged to its friends. But who and where is the extraordinary person who says that it belongs to its enemies? General BUTLER has not the pluck of Senator MARCY. That gentleman did not wince in justifying the maxim of the New York politicians that to the victors belong the spoils of their enemy. As this is what General BUTLER means, it is a pity that he did not have the courage to say it.

The only reason recorded in the reports of the speeches that was offered for the nomination of General BUTLER to the Presidency is that suggested by ex-Governor SPRAGUE, that we are drifting toward a dangerous abyss. That would indeed be the conviction of many others besides ex-Governor SPRAGUE if it were supposed that the country were drifting toward the Presidency of General BUTLER.

PERSONAL.

THE most notable piece of furniture in General GRANT'S house, No. 3 East Sixty-sixth Street, is a carved oaken cabinet in the library on the first floor, which contains a variety of presents received by the illustrious soldier during the last twenty years. One of its shelves is laden with gold headed canes, curiously inscribed; another, with little emblems inclosing the freedom of several European cities; a third, with curious meerschaum pipes and other knickknacks. So liable has the General been to give to a guest some souvenir from his collection that Mrs. GRANT recently locked the cabinet and hid the key.

—The London Athenæum believes that of all the thinkers who have appeared in America, the late HENRY JAMES "may perhaps be described as the most mystical," and that "the impressionality which he worshipped gradually gained expression in his face and manner, not, indeed, without adding a certain charm."

—Mr. LESLIE STEPHEN, being about to edit a new biographical dictionary, has been asked whether anything in the way of "literary style" is to be admitted into the work. He replies: "If style means superfluous ornament, I say, emphatically, No. But style, and even high literary ability, is required for lucid and condensed narrative, and of such style I shall be anxious to get as much as I can."

—The Chinese Minister at Washington is said to own silk and satin clothing worth one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

—Governor BENJAMIN F. BUTLER'S wearing of a full-dress suit at noonday on the occasion of his inauguration is warmly defended by a Massachusetts editor, who declares that the General "followed the custom of his predecessors in being inaugurated in a swallow-tail," and that "full dress is the proper apparel for all high public occasions and duties"—for instance, DANIEL WEBSTER "always appeared in the Senate of the United States" so arrayed, and it is still customary for "lawyers of the old school" to argue before the Massachusetts Supreme Court in full dress.

—In his recently published Autobiography, the late Sir ARCHIBALD ALISON expresses with much freedom his opinions concerning some of the persons he had met. He dislikes Dr. CHALMERS for his republican sentiments, Lord BROUGHAM for his wretched conceit, the historian HALLAM for his superficiality of conversation, Lord BROUGHAM for his post prandial rhetoric, the Duke of ARGYLL for his self confidence. MACAULAY seems to have bored him, and GLADSTONE was a "most dangerous person to be intrusted with practical power." DICKENS made a fatal mistake in painting the manners and foibles of middle and low life. "We are unhappily too familiar with these, if we seek to see them, you have only to go into the second-class of a railway train, or the cabin of a steamboat." Sir ARCHIBALD, a prides himself in having moved in "respectably descended" society, laments the lack of female beauty in "elevated circles." When about forty he was earning ten thousand dollars a year as sheriff of Lanarkshire and man of letters. He died at seventy-five, with a pure opinion of the critics.

—Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER wrote to the Illinois State Bar Association: "It is to the State Bar Associations we must look for such control over the social relations and professional intercourse of the members of the bar as their increasing numbers render necessary; for only by the united sense of the profession, as expressed by these societies, can any practical restraint be exercised over the black sheep that get into our flock, as into all others."

—Count CAVOUR'S letters are being collected and published in Italy in three volumes. In several of them the statesman expresses his admiration for Sir ROBERT PEEL, upon whose character he endeavored to form his own. They demand to know whether such scenery is to be "polluted by cuttings and sidings."

—If Mr GLADSTONE, says one of his countrymen, is willing to accept some titular recognition of his public services, it may be predicted with confidence that it will be in the shape of what may be called a vicarious peerage, and that it is upon the head of Mrs. GLADSTONE or some other member of her family that the coronet will fall.

—Mrs. JOHN JACOB ASTOR, of New York city, who has already provided one thousand waifs of this metropolis with homes in the West, sent thither a hundred more on New-Year's Day.

—The third and concluding volume of the Life of Bishop Wilberforce, by his son, is pronounced by a foreign reviewer to be not exactly what the bishop's truest friends and admirers could have wished it to be, for, "instead of depicting this eminent man as gradually travelling down the decline of life, leaving behind him in his course all the passions and ambitions which had vexed its meridian, and setting an example to the world of the philosophic mind and charitable temper which both the old age of a great Christian prelate, we find, we are sorry to say, a record of personal malignity and petty scandal which it is grievous to peruse, however enlivened with witty repartees or humorous anecdotes."

In addition to the one hundred and twenty-three oil paintings mentioned in his printed catalogue, he has recently come into the possession of some fine water-colors, notably two superb examples of VILLEGAS. Most of the pictures are hung against a background of tapestry of a dull reddish tone, above a wainscoting of ebonized oak and cherry.

—A remarkable octogenarian is Professor ALBERTO S. PACHARD, of Bowdoin College, who, after receiving the congratulations of the Massachusetts Historical Society on his eighty-fourth birthday, said: "In ordinary health age steals upon us velvet-footed. The celebrated Dr. CHALMERS, of England, when beyond sixty declared that he often felt like a boy. A relative of mine at eighty-four told me that when in his chair he felt as young as at twenty-five. My father at the age of eighty-seven left unfinished a letter to Mr. STEPHEN LONGFELLOW in an steady a hand and as consecutive in thought as any written in earlier life. On my eightieth birthday it was hinted that I might have evil eyes. I accordingly donned my best spectacles and so I stood to receive. I will say frankly that I felt as if I were acting a farce, and my friends were pleased to join in carrying out an illusion and a pretense. There are compensations for those in advanced years: they have their privilege of thinking that former times were better than the present."

LIBERTY AND PEACE STILL EXIST IN MASSACHUSETTS.

THE NEW GOVERNOR. "I am your most obedient servant"

RABBITS AND HARES

A CERTAIN distinguished lawyer of New York, some two years since, happened while abroad to visit the country house of an Englishman of title. He, knowing that our traveller was a sportsman, took uncommon pains to show him over his preserves, which were extensive and well stocked. After exhibiting his pheasants, old and young—the latter hatched and hovered by barn yard fowl—he showed him how rabbit-shooting in England is conducted. He supplied our friend with a gun. Together they proceeded to a large field thickly covered with ferns. This field was on the edge of a wood, near which was a rabbit-warren. The Englishman explained that the ferns were grown exclusively as a covert for rabbits. Later on, when the shooting season opened, parallel roads were cut through the fern, in which the sportsmen took their stations, while beaters drove out the game. As the rabbits bounded across these open spaces they were shot at. The Englishman remarked in parenthesis that it was a by no means easy thing to make successful shots; as a proof, he led our friend to the edge of the ferns nearest the wood, while he stirred up the rabbits. These came bundering out of the ferns in large numbers. As they flashed across the open, the American, although a good shot, made a number of very flagrant misses. The Englishman, who was critically watching his performances, on the occasion of every miss shouted to him, in a high, shrill voice, "Sharp little beggars, aren't they?"

In this country we know nothing of these "sharp little beggars." We have no wild rabbits. The animal which goes by that name with us is, in fact, a hare. The English rabbit is a burrowing and gregarious creature. Its young are born blind, and destitute of hair. Our rabbit, or rather hare, never burrows; he is solitary in his habits, he is born with his eyes open, and body covered with fur. The English rabbit, when disturbed, makes directly for his burrow or warren, while ours seeks refuge in a tuft of grass or under the underbrush of the woods; when started from his form, he travels in a circle of greater or lesser radius, always returning to the original point of departure.

Our rabbit is usually found in pine woods and in thickets on rocky hill sides. Its diet consists of leaves, berries, and wild grapes. As an article of food the rabbit is very much underestimated. Among country people a superstition exists that it is not fit to be eaten until after a frost. In point of fact, when properly cooked, and served with a rich brown sauce, no flesh is more delicate and succulent. The white meat found on the back has the juiciness of a well-fed fowl, while the darker meat has a gaminess of flavor not inferior to that of the partridge. Yet how seldom does one meet with wild rabbit on the dinner table! This is possibly owing to the skill required to prepare it. There is an higher test of a cook's capacity than the power to serve a salmis of wild rabbit no that it shall not be full of fellow suggestiveness.

The rabbit or hare found in Canada and our Middle and Eastern States is a pigmy compared with the species met with on the plains and western slopes of the Rocky Mountains. There is found the mule or jackass rabbit, a true hare, with ears six inches in length, and weighing from seven to eleven pounds. It possesses great speed and powers of endurance. The only coursing club formed to hunt these animals with greyhounds in this country is in California. This furnishes a valuable suggestion to the members of the various fox hunts which have within late years been established in imitation of the English, in various portions of the United States. It is the fashion with these to run an aniseed drag over selected country, within a hundred yards or so of the finish an apology for a fox is turned loose. This creature is frequently so bewildered and exhausted by long confinement that he hardly has time to make a few feeble leaps before he is torn to pieces by the hounds. Now if these huntsmen will dispose of their dogs, and import an equal number of couples of English horriers, and bring from the West healthy specimens of the jackass rabbit, they will have cut out for themselves a form of hunting which will either make the sport something worth indulging in or entirely suppress it. These jackass rabbits can probably be procured in any number. Confine them any length of time, on their release they will exhibit a vigor and go which will be a surprise both to the huntsmen and the hounds. The level plains of Long Island are particularly fitted for this purpose. The only drawback there is the use of the barbed wire fence—an ugly thing to put a horse at. Those, however, who hunt for the pleasure of the thing, and not to be in with a temporary fashion, will not mind this. These "hunts," if they wish to save themselves from ridicule, should look into the subject of utilizing the mule rabbit. There could be no finer sport than to course this animal over the breezy plains of Long Island with greyhounds, or follow him along the wooded slopes with a pack of horriers. This is no new thing in this country. It is done, and well done, in California, and by our army officers at distant Western posts. To successfully accomplish it here, however, over the miscellaneous fences with which our landscape is covered, would demand the best of horseflesh and cool, accomplished horsemen. During the wire fences, there is no reason why it should not be attempted. The rabbits indigenous to our locality would not be at all suited to this purpose. They lack speed and endurance. Moreover, they run in a small circle, and confine themselves almost entirely during the daytime to the thick cover of the woods.

Rabbit-shooting is essentially a winter sport. After a light fall of snow one is surprised at the vast activity shown by one of those animals, as seen in the multitude of tracks which dot the surface in every direction. To follow those which lead to the pile of brush under which the rabbit has his home requires a good deal of experience. It is but rarely that two are found occupying the same "form." Indeed, of a wild rabbit is caught alive and put into a box, and a second be placed with him after the lapse of a day or two, they will in a few moments tear each other in pieces.

To have in three days rabbit-shooting in any profusion one must go to the West. Formerly Long Island was one of the most noted localities in this country for these animals. They could be found there to-day in considerable numbers were it not that every leaf during the winter season devotes his leisure moments to setting snares for them. The few which are left conceal themselves in the dense wilds covered with scrub oaks and underbrush.

Everything original and bizarre which we have in this country, whether of art, or of quaint disclosures of domestic life, or of strange and fantastic deviations in the animal world, comes to us from the West. The hare and rabbit form no exception to this rule. East of the Mississippi River we are evident with one variety of this animal, west of that point we are confronted with half a dozen sorts of the same, the most startling number of the group being captured by Dr. Hayden in the Wind River Mountains. This was a small rabbit, of which he secured only a few specimens. These revealed the fact that the males outlive the young. This was satisfactorily demonstrated by careful observations and dissections. It is possible that in the ages to come, in the process of evolution, the male of the human species, at least in that section of country, may develop the same habit. When this comes to pass, the most exacting mother-in-law will cease her reproaches, and rest content. Such an occurrence would crown the edifice of Western wonders. To the humorous paragraphists of this period there will be opened a field compared to which ours is a dismal and barren waste. There is only one of many specimens of the hare or rabbit kind found in the wonderful West. Besides the mule rabbit already spoken of, there is the prairie hare, hardly inferior in size. We often see him in our markets in the winter season; he is distinguishable from being entirely white—a marking he always takes on on the approach of cold. Then we have the California hare, another of the largest kind. The "cotton-tail" is more akin in size and color to the one common to our section of the country. The sage rabbit is peculiar to the plains of the West on which the bush of that name flourishes. As an article of food, new to a starving man, he is voluptious. The above are not all found in the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains. After Professor Harper's revelations we may be prepared for developements in the rabbit way far more startling than were "the sherry little beggars" some friend the lawyer.

Leonie Renzo to the R. P. Ferraris, etc., etc :

"I have something to tell you, which excites and oppresses me, yet when you hear it you may think it as nothing. I must premise this by saying that miladi, when she left, gave me the keys of the library, and free permission to look over and employ as I chose all the works on art, and all the old engravings and drawings, of which there are many. The family has not been a studious one as a rule, but it appears that the late Earl, the uncle Alured to whom she succeeded, was a collector, a dilettante, a virtuoso (the terms are not entirely synonymous), and almost all these collections that concern art were made by him. I demurred to having the keys of these cabinets left with me, but miladi so insisted, and seemed so bent upon giving me this mark of her trust in me good faith, that I could not without churlishness refuse, though I would willingly have been without so great a responsibility, and I believe Mr Lawton, the magnificent major-domo, was extremely offended. However, I thought I could not reject so kind a sign of confidence, and there is an amount of congenial work to be done in this room on those rainy days of which there are so many! The drawings (really valuable old masters) are all in confusion both as to dates and manners, the miniatures and medals are similarly pell mell, and a fine collection of old proof engravings, chiefly Italian, are in as much disorder as though they were mere cuttings from illustrated newspapers. I look up the library when I me not to work there, which makes the dignified Mr Lawton regard me as his mortal foe. Non amongst all this chaos, of which almost every component part has a distinct artistic value, there are sketches by the late Earl Alured, who died some thirty years ago or more. They are sketches of considerable power and spirit. If he had not been a great gentleman, he might very likely have been a famous painter. Amongst these sketches, which me chiefly of figures and faces, there is one in red crayon of a Roman girl, and this girl has the features that I so well remember as those of my mother. There is nothing written under it; has in another portfolio I found three other drawings, all of the same face, and one, a full-length figure bearing on her head a water jar. You will say this may be the merest coincidence and accident of resemblance, the ontional type—no more. It may be so. On the other hand, is it impossible that this man was her lover? Will you, my best friend, be as infinitely good as to write me word, any details that you can remember or collect of her? Was the nationality of my father ever known? Pray reply to me fully, and to once."

Don Eccellino Ferraris, Florinella sopra-Subiaco, to Leonie Renzo, Milton Ernest

"I reply instantly, my dear son, to your letter, which Ammann brings me from Subiaco this afternoon. But I know on more than I have already and repeatedly told you that to me mother was known all her life to the people of these hills; that she was the daughter of Evaristo Renzo, the buttero, that a foreigner was about here some weeks who was supposed to be an artist; that Nerina Renzo went away with him, and was absent for a year, in which year Renzo the buttero was killed by a bull he was lassoing; that on her return she said on wood of where she had been; inherited just enough to live on from Renzo the buttero, and in a few months' time gave birth to a son—yourself—whom I myself baptised and registered under the names of Leonie Renzo. I gave you Leonie on the same to which my little church here is dedicated, and Renzo as that of your grandfather. Your mother lived till you were seven years old, and when she died she was only twenty five years of age. She never, in the confessional or out of it, told me a syllable as to her history during the year she had been absent, or as to the name, country, or rank of the man who begat you. Though she was a most lovely creature in person, and quite sane in many ways, I never believed that she was quite in possession of her mental faculties after your birth. Some great grief which she had had, and the shock of hearing of her father's death, which was told her abruptly and with all its horrible details by a shepherd whom she met on her way here, had, I think, unhinged her mind without destroying it. However this might be, it was impossible to extract a word from her as to your parentage. I have always concluded that she was deserted in some capricious and sudden manner by her lover, who very possibly might not even know that she was gravida. It is not improbable that he was a noble. The few people here who remember him all say he was an uomo signore. But they would say that of any one who spent a little money. This is all that I know, my beloved son, who has been truly a son of the spirit to me. If I knew more, under the seal of the confessional, I would not hesitate to reveal it to you; but your mother either never wholly trusted me, or loved her seducer too well to speak of him. She erred in that; but it is my belief, as I have said, that her mind was always clouded after her return. She adored you, and perhaps would have left some truth for you to hear, if she had lived till you were older, or if she had had any foreboding of her early and sudden death from heart-disease. It is strange that you should have found any picture which is like her in that English house so far away. But you will forgive me if I suggest, my beloved Leonie, that the childish memory even of a mother's face can not be entirely trusted, and the purely classic type of face which she had, and which you have, is by no means rare in our country, especially in remote places where the blood has been kept pure and unchanged since the days of Æneas."

The Lady Charteris, Avernby, Salop, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome (telegraphs).

"The D of K has arrived here, so I go to the Adrian Vanatitarts to-morrow. What good do you suppose can come of this intolerable annoyance? Make him understand that on one can badly me into anything. I shall have a big party at Milton for pheasants. Come."

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to Lady Charteris, Avernby, Salop

"All I shall are of pheasants will he quails: I reply more Hibernico. Do you mean you are going back next month? I thought you never could be at Milton in autumn because it was so damp."

The Lady Charteris, Redleaf, Devon, to Mr Hollyn, Rome.

"It is damp in a damp autumn. This is a dry one. I shall soon be home."

Mr Hollyn, Rome, to Lady Charteris, Redleaf, Devon:

"Perversity, thy name is woman."

The Lady Charteris to Mr Hollyn:

"Not on original remark. Was it worth pay ing a post-card to say that? Why I should not invite my own friends to my own house to slay my own pheasants is, I confess, wholly beyond my own comprehension. Perhaps you will explain a little?"

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to Lady Charteris, Lafford, Hants:

"In my trade we never explain. A discreet roundabout is all we venture on; I have given a hint, I dare on more."

The Lady Charteris, Lafford, Hants, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome

"Hints and innuendoes are first cousins. Neither are remarkable for courage, and I confess I am never disposed to be to the trouble to take their masks off. If you like to come to Milton, do; I shall be most happy to see you. If you don't, stay, and eat your quails rolled up in vine leaves, and spare me moral saws and stale apoph thegms, and inappropriate counsels that don't dare show their faces."

Mr. Hollyn to the Lady Charteris, Montolieu Abbey, near Winchester:

"You are unkind, and are you quite grateful? The ball-room would never have been painted if it hadn't been for me. You would have had a fourmancier, and you wouldn't have discovered a 'dry autumn.' Ily-the-bye, the Meteorological Report states the rain-fall in England this September to average eight inches!"

Leonie Renzo, Milton Ernest, to Don Eccellino Ferraris, Florinella-supra-Subiaco, etc., etc :

"She has returned, bringing a great number of gay and great personages with her; she is very sweet and thoughtful to her manner to me, but it seems to me as if I were millions of leagues further off from her, since the possibility which haunts me that I may be the bastard of her noble it overwhelms me with shame. There are coming here some English princes, and the ball-room and all my outlined frescoes are being covered temporarily with primrose-hued satin, as that I are driven from my labors; and she has proposed to me that I shall take her portrait, and need it to the Salon or the Academy next week I can not refuse. So every morning she gives me a sitting in the library, of which she allows me to make a temporary studio; she would not only hach the keys of it. I admit that it is a trying thing to me to do, with this suspicion upon me, which is indeed to my mind almost a certainty, that the Earl Alured, to whom she succeeded, was the luithless lover of my mother. I have ventured to speak of him to her when we have been alone to these sittings, but she knows very little about him. She was not born when he died suddenly, being thrown from his horse, she has always been told he was an eccentric, wayward, capricious man: she said, with a little laugh, that capriciousness was to the blood of the family. The Lady Calmwrath has returned with her; and, alas! conceives it her duty to be almost always present in the library during the then that I not painting this portrait; they regard me as a wild beast, seeking to devour this lamb with the golden fleece! The portrait will be beautiful and grand; I have dealt with it in the Venetian way: she wears a wonderful dress of dead-gold brocade, with scarlet touches in it here and there, and holds a large fan, black and gold, and is just looking over her shoulder with a little smile; her great Leonsberg dog Herwiah is beside her; he is gray, and tones down the intense mass of gold and scarlet. But the face! there is the miracle and glory of it. She is much more beautiful than I first thought her, and her expression is changed—deepened and softened both. This week the sittings are interrupted by the English Prince and Princess. The house is all astir to agree on account of them. Stupendous efforts are made for their entertainment, and the English Princes, with seven other gentlemen, slew fifteen hundred pheasants in a day, which is considered admirable. I are always glad to think that I never in my life slew anything. I have seen many other better ways of proving one's address, if one needs to do so. There was a grand ball last night, in the room that I am temporarily turned out of: I keep away from it all, of course. I even proposed to her to go away not of the house during the time, but she would not hear of it; and the other afternoon she showed the Prince and Princess what I have done of her portrait, and sent for me and presented me to them both, and they said gracious things, which I not conscious were not overstrained, for I know my force in my own art. One of the gentlemen of the suite told me later that the Princess would command me to paint her portrait. I answered him, perhaps wrongly, that I was an portrait painter. Miladi scolded me very prettily for being dowrra and proud at the wrong moment. 'When they are delighted with you, what is there to offend you, even if they are princes?' So she remonstrated, and had reason in her remonstrance, and perhaps I was thoughtless. I suppose it is these people who represent the goddess Fortune nowadays. The royal guests remained here but three days, during which, I am told, they were well pleased. They sent for me again before their departure, and again expressed themselves with much grace and kindness. The greater part of the other guests also went away; to-day and to-morrow the will set to me again. I fear that the virility toward me of the royal persons did not gratify my formidable enemy the Lady Calmwrath. But what is that all matter? Soon they will leave me alone again. The long winter will pass, and the spring will probably find the ball-room and the portrait alike finished, and then I too shall go away, and she will not hear, see, or remember me any more. There is one thing quite certain, I will not take her money for either of the works. Perhaps favor may come to me through her; and fro that I shall be grateful. Yet I do not care for fame of any kind, I care only for art. I should be glad to have moderate wealth, enough to spend my life as I like, after my own manner, and in the pursuit of my own dreams. I may seem to prose to you insolently, but it is a relief to me, for there is on one here in whom I can confide my thoughts. To miladi I dare not; to the others I could not; and you have been my confessor since the hour of my first sin! . . .

Lord Llandudno, Milton Ernest, Berks, to Hon. H. Hollyn, British Embassy, Rome

"DEAR HOLLYN.—It was on one. She could come back, and she asked a whole tribe of people, and then to top it the P and P suddenly fixed their arrival for the end of the month, so there was no more to be said, and all my ingenuity in having succeeded in persuading Esmée into these visits was bootless. She made the painter begin her portrait, and whatever else she means, she's getting plenty of good work out of him. The fellow is amazingly handsome, in romantic sort of somebody, but I can't remember of whom. Esmée certainly puts him on the fore a good deal, she asked about him so to the P and P that she made her paint, and was allowed to present him to them. But this may all be done only to rile Tabby. There is no knowing with a woman like Esmée what she's really up to, she knows the world down to the ground, and if she makes a move, she's a purpose in it; but yet again she's a weather-cock. The Indian adores her—that's plain to be seen; when we were last here, he'd the whip hand of her; now she's the pull over him. I suppose it's only her fun, but it will be rough on the poor devil. I don't see who we can any of us do. Esmée isn't a chicken. If you'd sent the diplomased and decorated one that you spoke of, there would have been none of this bother. She says she's going to Cannes next month, and has ordered the Gitana to refit and go in Mediterranean trim. She can hardly take the painter on board with her. The C of O. informs me that you and I are responsible for all this scandal. Yes, I know, are; but I don't see where I come in; by-the-way, in case we're obliged to have more to do with this woe, can't you learn really something about him?"

Mr. Hollyn, Rome, to Lord Llandudno, Milton Ernest:

"DEAR LLANDY,—There is nothing to learn; he never concealed where he came from. He's the abnormal are of a woman of Fontanella, and his grandfather was a buttero: that is, please your ignorance, a wild-cattle keeper. The priest of Fontanella—who has a history too, les he is a noble, and took the vow of poverty and entered the Church in consequence of the tragic death of a mistress—loves him, but has nothing to do with him: so the last all the folk of Florinella are agreed. The priest educated him, and assimilated him afterward at the University of Rome, where he took high honors. He then studied art (living very miserably, I suspect) in Paris and Munich, and then spent his lily between his studio (a garret) in Rome and the priest's little house up in the hills at Florinella, where he painted those frescoes in the little church which led to my most unfortunate acquaintance with him. That is all that is to be known. He is now thirty-three years of age. You will see it is all quite creditable, more creditable perhaps than yours or mine; but, as society is constituted, Esmée must on more look at him than if he were a forger or a hangman. I suppose we are all humbugs, but belle est la vie. If you are at your (very clever) wits' ends on the spot, what am I a thousand miles off? What I should most fear would be an irreparable breach between Esmée and the C. of O., and the adoption as chaperon of some frisky matron, like her friend Mrs Ainsgee, who will let her do just as she likes, and get compromised in a hideous fashion. My chief hope lies in Renan himself. I think he is a man of honor. I think if he sees mischief ahead, he will go away out of it."

Lord Llandudno, Milton Ernest, to Hon. H Hollyn, Rome:

"I have never believed in Joseph, especially would Joseph be an impossibility when a beautiful young woman offered herself en deux bons tout Anamour. Don't be alarmed; she's not at that point yet, perhaps never will be. As yet she is only having her portrait taken, and I bet it will beat 'La bella di Tiziano.' The C. of O. presides at the sittings, looking like Duty on a rock standing at Danger, or something of that sort. The Alnager is going on the Gitana, and that may mean any amount of mischief. Vic. was at my house the other day, looking very blue, poor boy. He won't take his punishing without whimpering. How could that marriage miss fire? You and I should have had nothing to do except to sign our names to the most perfect settlements the world ever saw. To think, too, how the properties dove-tail into one another! It is floating Providence; but she has done the same thing twenty times a year ever since she left her school-room."

Mr Hollyn, Rome, to Lord Llandudno, Milton Ernest (telegraphs).

"Do you mean to say you think the affair with R. serious?"

Lord Llandudno to Mr. Hollyn (writes).

"It looks like it. She put me off the event last time, but now I begin to think the C. of O. not altogether so wrong. However, it may be all caprice. She is, after all, only having her portrait taken; why should we interfere? I tried to say something this morning, and she looked me in the face with the coolest little smile, and just said, 'It is on much nicer than a photograph, that people can roll, whether one lets them or not.' Just as if she couldn't have Carolus Duran or Bandry to take her portrait! Just as if she hadn't been painted half a score of times before now! I do believe he has a great influence over her; she has left off using the kohl to her eyes; she wears her hair in loose soft masses, instead of crimping and frizzing her fringe; she has taken to quite simple sorts of gowns, with old fashioned gold girdles and gypsires as her only ornament. 'I suppose that's aesthetic?' I said to Hermione, and Hermie regarded me with scorn. 'How can you be so silly? It's Renzo. She sent some of his sketches over to Worth, with orders. Esmée never did care a bit about the aesthetics, but she likes to please him, don't she know?' I did know, and I groaned, and I know the man ought to go away, but on my life I don't see who he should throw it all up merely to oblige us. Besides, he is honestly in love with her, he is the only person in the house, perhaps, who does not know it, but he is so. As she is perfectly charming and enchantingly considerate toward him, why should he turn his back on all that?"

Mr Hollyn to Lord Llandudno:

"You know as well as I do that men who are poor do turn their backs on all that when they are gentlemen, and I think he is a gentleman; but I grant the temptation is terrible if he really can see he has any influence over her. I confess the whole thing seems so incredible to me that it is like a nightmare. What does she mean to do? She never can mean to marry him. He hasn't a sou, and not even a name!"

Lord Llandudno to Mr. Hollyn:

"I certainly don't dare hint to her that she does, but I think her quite capable of it. She would love to do it if only for the pleasure of bewving the C of O and quarreling with all the rest of us. She is her own mistress, you know. No hope of the Lord Chancellor here. Frankly I want no be out of it, so I'm going on short beam and sealwork with Hobenkike in Styria. I think if she's left quite alone she'll are the folly of the thing. The sense of opposition keeps her obstinate, not, mind you, that there's anything definite yet. They're only still in this infernal portrait. The portrait will be grand; he handles the dead gold and the scarlet with amazing skill; you certainly knew what you were about, and picked out a man who could paint. Hermione and Jack Herbert have come to terms; they'll be married some time after Christmas. Everybody quite pleased all round. 'That would spoil it on me,' said Esmée the other day. I declared I quite believed her. She likes a chopping nor and a stiff wind when she's out. If she does lose her head about the Romans, it will only be out of 'contrariness.'"

Leonie Renzo Milton Ernest, to Don Eccellino Ferraris, Florinella-supra-Subiaco:

"DEAREST FRIEND AND REVERSED FATHER.—You are quite right; the suspicion which has come into my mind concerning the Earl Alured poisons the peace and pleasure I had found in my pursuits here. It may be altogether fanciful and unfounded, but the mere shadow of it is enough to darken my path: especially when I are in her presence the thought is oppressive and of an almost unbearable humiliation. If I could speak of him I could ask her permission to seek through any papers he may have left for more evidence, mere confirmation; but this it is impossible to do. I could never bring my lips to frame a hint of it. After all, too, I should most likely me nothing mine. The mere pastime of an English nobleman with an Italian girl would leave no impression on the life and memory of such a man to be, even if he loved her, as the owner in the doe's collar would suggest. Those great gentlemen break so many of these poor butterflies upon the wheel in a summer's day!

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1360.

"The portrait grows; they say it is like the style of Cabanel, which incenses me: Cabanel is a great master, but I hope I am not borrowing from him or any one; I paint what I see on I feel it, and if I have any master at all, I go farther back than Cabanel, and straightway to the Venice of the Cinque-cento. Mihalk is all that is sweetest and most kind; say, she is too good to me: it offends all her own people, that I can see. When the portrait is done, she will go away at once on a vessel of her own southward, and the long, cold, blank English winter faces me. Well, if only there will be light enough, I shall occupy myself. I rise at daybreak to go on with the Theocritan frescoes, I can not bear her to suppose that I purposely delay my work for sake of the ease of my life here. If the weather serve, I mean to finish them by next Easter. She does not, I believe, return until then, as she goes from the Riviera straight to her house in London, without coming here after her winter in the South. She asked me, a little abruptly, this morning if I would not like to go to Rome for the winter; she said I was not to think for a moment that I was bound to finish the hall-room until it was quite convenient to me; if my habits as my health needed a warmer air in winter—then she stopped and looked at me, and I did not altogether understand her, but I felt my face grow hot, for I knew that if had on money to return to Rome: I spent all I had in coming here and in the purchase of the colors, and certainly I would die sooner then tell her that. When I hear all these people talk of going here, going there, of flying this way and that, like so many happy birds, I understand that to be poor is to be a bird without wings, like that poor hopeless, ugly apteryx which is the laughing-stock of naturalists and the cruel jest of nature . . . .

"The lord who is a sort of tutore came to me just now when I was alone and commenced conversation. He does not speak French very well, but I could fairly understand him. He said some hard things of mihadi. He ended by hinting to me that she was 'coquette et fine mouche.' I said to him that I did not think that concerned me, and that it was not for me, who received many benefits from her, to listen to blame of her. This confused him a little. He got up, said quickly 'Eh bien je m'en lave les mains!' and then added that he was himself going away into Styria. He seemed to wish me to give him some assurance, but I did not see that any was needed. They seem to attach much more importance to me than I can possibly claim. Is she a coquette? I do not think so. And if she be, what is that to me? I me only a man who paints her portrait and her hall-room. And I may be something she would think yet lower than the sweeper who cleans her terrace of its leaves. . . .

"This morning whilst it was still very early she entered the hall room when I was beginning my work. She has risen early the last week as two; I have seen her, and once or twice met her in the gardens soon after sunrise. 'Why do you work so hard?' she asked me when she had looked at what I was doing. 'Why are you in such haste to have finished the thing? Are you tired of England, of Milton?' I told her that I thought common honesty needed that the work should be done with as little waste of time as it could. 'And when it is done,' she said, in her abrupt fashion that yet is graceful too, 'will you go away and have an regret for me?' I felt myself grow pale, for I knew that I should suffer—much—but I answered her that if in the end she considered the work well done I should have no regrets: then; I should have only great gratitude. 'Gratitude!' She repeated the word with some anger. She looked very beautiful. She had a white woollen gown on with black fur all round it, and she had a quantity of red autumn roses in her hand. 'It is we who owe you gratitude,' she said, earnily. 'It is I who owe you gratitude. You give my house beautiful fancies and images, and you have made me think; you have made me feel, you have made me conscious of the emptiness and the egotism of toy life.' I said nothing—what could I say?—to her. 'I think you are far too proud,' she said, after a little pause, 'and yet you have so far too much humility. Do you mean to say you will like to remain here all alone all the cold, dreary, lonely winter?' You will be miserable. You have an idea how cold it is, how unutterably dull.' I told her I did not think that it would be colder than my former garden had been in Paris, or was even in Rome, when the tramontana blew; and I said that I should not be miserable because her memory—and her portrait—would remain with me. Perhaps it was wrong to say even so much. But it did not offend her. She smiled and gave me one of her roses, and ordered me to come to breakfast with her. I hesitated very much, but she insisted, on that I could not refuse. I breakfasted with her and the little Lady Hermione before any one else staying in the house was up, and we laughed and chattered and were merry and happy, and the smell of the sweet wet grass and the late roses came through the windows which we could leave open a little, for it is here what we call St. Martin's summer. Well, it is much to have these beautiful hours to remember even if afterward one goes not into endless hunger and darkness for evermore!

"But, looking back on it all, here, on I write alone, the thought comes to me which seems in their almost madness. Is it possible that she would—that she does—love me? What must I do? Counsel me."

Don Excellino Ferraro, Florinella-supra-Subiaco, to Lennie Renzo, Milton Ernest, etc., etc.

"My ancient Son.—It is not for me to counsel you at such a distance from you as I am, and having so long and altogether abandoned the great world. But your nature is noble, your pride is great, greater perhaps because some would deny your right to it: act, therefore, as both these bid you. That this lady is drawn toward you I can well believe, that you care for her more than you know, I have long felt; but I confess I see nothing but suffering in store for you through this passion. If you wish to leave the place and the country, command me; you know my purse, meagre as it is, is always open to you, and here you may find, on if have done, peace at least of conscience, if palon of memory pursue you even to these heights."

Lennie Renzo to Don Excellino Ferraro, etc., etc.:

"You are, as ever, good beyond my merits. If she leave here, I will stay on and complete the work. If she remain, you are right—I must go. Peace will be no more mine wherever my steps may turn."

The Countess of Chertsey to Mr. Thomas, Yacht "Glaucus," Cowes Harbor:

"Take her round to Marseilles, and there was telegram from me."

Lennie Renzo, Milton Ernest, to Don Excellino Ferraro, Florinella-supra-Subiaco, etc., etc.:

"She is gone. I suppose some pressure was brought to bear on her, or perhaps she wished to escape from a position that became an embarrassment. I do not know. I think she has some love for me; but I hear always the voice of that old lord saying, 'Elle est coquette et fine mouche.' Yet I wrong her; I see how to want more than she has given me—the utmost sweetness and delicacy and consideration to the last, so much more than I should have been warranted in expecting! The evening before she left she came to take farewell of me when I was at work on her portrait, which is all but finished, a few touches to the drapery and to the dog alone are needed. She said to me, 'If it be very cold, as indeed you had better go to Rome, or will soon come out to us at Cannes, and make another picture of me amongst the palms?' Her voice was very low and kind. It cost me very much to look at her calmly and say, as I did, No. I think she understood that it was no discourtesy she said nothing else. She gave me her hand. There were tears in her beautiful eyes. Mine were dim. You were right. There is pain, great pain, for both of us; but here will soon pass, rich, happy, adored, surrounded, amused with a thousand distractions as she is and will be, but mine— No doubt what she feels for me is mere interest, mere compassion, rather than the divine pity of Beatrenna, perhaps she has respect for me too, because I have never bettered her. But it is impossible that she seriously loves me. If she did, she is far removed from me as though mountains were between us. If I could accept her were she to offer it, how she would despise me then and forever!

"I have my first taste of no English winter today. It is bitterly cold, and rains, and hails, and snows. It is impossible to paint. I continue my work in the library; I have seen many cases and drawers full of drawings, manuscripts and engravings still to examine and arrange. It is a noble room, and the great fire lit at either end fills it full of mellow color. I could be quite happy here if—if—if. I have sent to my friend Vico in Rome to dispose of the pictures there are in my studio if he can, even if he get but twenty francs apiece, and send me the money; I can leave here if she return, as it is her desire that I sometimes act as don's tutive. She treats me a most kind and pretty note this morning. It cost me much to answer with a few formal lines, but she would despise me if I let myself do more. She has reached Cannes in fortnight ago. She describes her villa, with its orange woods and gardens and its walls of many-colored marble, and the little harbor all to itself, with arch deep water that her yacht can anchor there. She asks me to go out and see it, and paint it all: she puts aside toy refusal as if it had never been uttered. Do you think she would be so cruel as to play with me so far? Yet I me a fool, and thankless. No doubt she only means it in innocent kindness, and never dreams that I shall distort it so."

THE MILWAUKEE FIRE.

The burning of the Newhall Hotel in Milwaukee, with the sacrifice of perhaps one hundred lives, is another terrible warning against the numberless "fire traps" which, in the form of hotels, theatres, and tenement-houses, are tolerated in American cities. This hotel was notoriously an ensafe structure. It was old, most of the inner partitions and all the floor beams were of wood, and it had been so often on fire that the local insurance agents had recently refused to take any risk on the building. Six stories in height, with intricate passages and with stairways that allowed the flames and suffocating smoke to rush almost instantaneously from basement to roof, it was provided with only two fire-escapes.

Yet, so heedless is the traveling public, this dangerous building was one of the most popular hotels in Milwaukee, and on the night of January 9 it harbored more than three hundred people, including servants. A little before four o'clock on the morning of the 10th the alarm of fire was given, and the firemen who hastened to the scene beheld a spectacle of horror that has scarcely a parallel in the annals of similar calamities. Every window of the immense building was filled with struggling men and women, frantically and piteously calling for the aid which it was impossible to render. Some of the inmates found their way to the more entrance and escaped, and others might have been saved had an immediate and concerted attempt at rescue been made. But there was on one with sufficient presence of mind to take the lead. The halls of the hotel were the scene of the wildest confusion. Men, women, and children rushed hither and thither in the suffocating smoke, missing in their frenzy the staircase and windows leading to the fire-escapes. All this was witnessed by the horrified crowds that gathered in the streets.

The firemen worked with all their accustomed energy and dispatch; but their efforts were impeded by the net-work of telegraph wires which surrounded the building, and which prevented the raising of ladders to the windows. This is another warning which should not be allowed to pass unheeded. But for these wires, which should never be permitted to stretch along the sides of hotels as tenement-houses, many people might have been rescued by the firemen. The wires were also a hinderance to rescue in another way. Many persons who jumped from the windows toward the canvas held below struck the wires, and fell fearfully mangled on the pavement.

The tragic details of this calamity, already familiar through the full reports of the daily press, ought to make a more than passing impression on the public mind, and incite the proper authorities to take immediate measures for the security of life in hotels and other buildings where people congregate in large numbers. The proprietors of such buildings should not only be required, but compelled, to make them as absolutely safe on human precautions can make them. Every theatre, hotel, and large tenement-house should be fire-proof. The public is accustomed and willing to take chances, and should be protected, in the interest of humanity, against its own heedlessness. The Newhall was old, and everybody, says a Milwaukee editor, "had looked upon it as doomed if it ever got no fire in the night." Who can read of the heroism of the brave firemen who carried the forms of fainting women over the ladder bridge thrown across the narrow alley-way to the upper story of the burning building, of their unavailing efforts to reach the windows where the struggling victims were imprisoned, of the bodies mangled by falling on the deadly telegraph wires and sickling with a sickening thud on the pavement—who can think of the suffering and agony endured during that awful half-hour of martyrdom—without the indignation that such tragedies are possible? Yet any night may bring another. We open the morning paper dreading to read of some terrible calamity. On the seas it may be impossible to guard against disasters; but there is no excuse whatever for such tragedies as attend the burning of a theatre or a hotel. Such structures can either be made fire-proof, or be provided with appliances for putting out fire, and with adequate means of escape, so to make the loss of life from this source as rare as it is now common.

THE LATE SENATOR MORRILL.

The Hon. Lot M. Morrill, who died at his residence to Augusta, Maine, after a lingering illness, on the 10th inst., was born in Belgrade, Maine, on the 3d of May, 1813. At the age of nineteen he entered Waterville College, in that State, afterward studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1839. Mr Morrill made his entry into political life in 1854, when he was elected to the Maine Legislature. In 1856 he was elected to the State Senate, and became its President. Two years afterward he was elected Governor, and was re-elected in 1859 and 1860. Senator Hamlin having been elected Vice-President, Mr Morrill was chosen to take his place in the United States Senate for the remainder of her term, and in 1863 he was re-elected for the term ending in 1869. On the death of Senator Fessenden, Mr Morrill was again elected to the Senate for the term ending in 1877. On the resignation of Secretary Bateman, in June, 1870, Senator Morrill was made Secretary of the Treasury, which post he occupied until March, 1877. After his retirement from the secretaryship he was appointed Collector of the Port of Portland, Maine, which position he held at the time of his death.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

When a cold wave sweeps down from the Northwest, and the sympathies of the charitable go not toward those in the midst of on who are ill prepared to meet the rigors of winter, how many of the philanthropic ever give a thought to the distress of the poor Kennebec River iceman as their visions of a monopoly in ice suddenly pass away?

A young man of Mahanoy City, Pennsylvania, was choked to death by swallowing a shirt stud. When the loser is called upon to pay a forfeit of that nature, it is always allowable to remove the studs and buttons.

While the Prince of Wales was on a recent pleasure-trip he alighted at a railway station and bought a piece of sponge-cake. The bell rang for the train to start before he had finished eating the cake, and he left the remnant on the restaurant counter. The keeper of the restaurant labelled it: "Great curiosity! The Prince of Wales bit this. For sale." The story has it that he not only sold the piece for a large price, but also disposed of his entire stock of sponge-cake in the same advantageous manner before he destroyed the label.

A man who was skeptical as to the utility of the telephone was induced to step up to the instrument and shout "Hello, Sarah!" to his wife, who was five miles away. At that moment lightning struck the wire and knocked him senseless. His first words on recovering consciousness were, "That's Sarah, every time."

The Sun takes Mayor Edson to task for mentioning the "working classes." It insists that there are no such classes in this glorious republic. There is here and there, however, a man who finds it necessary to stick to his play pretty regularly.

After those who had gathered at a church in Providence, Rhode Island, to see a wedding ceremony had waited an hour for the contracting parties to appear, the organist struck up the tune, "Oh dear, what can the matter be?" The bride soon came in smiling, and proved that the case not "tied up to an apple-tree."

One of the first official acts of Governor Cleveland was to dismiss the Pardon Clerk, and say that he would attend to the duties of that position himself. It is said that when Governor Cleveland was practicing law he went to Albany to intercede for the life of a man who had been sentenced to the gallows, that he was told by the Pardon Clerk that "we" would do nothing in the matter, and that he found considerable difficulty in obtaining an audience with the Governor, but easily succeeded in obtaining mercy for the condemned man when he had no opportunity to present his petition. The Pardon Clerk who stood between him and the Governor, the story has it, is the one who was dismissed.

A feature of life in Denver, says a writer, is that fortune hunters are sometimes found paying their addresses to the kitchen rather than the parlor. The secret of this is that servant-girls have a way of investing their earnings in building lots, which advance in value so rapidly that the owners soon find themselves in a state bordering on opulence.

The advent upon the floor of a new member of the Stock Exchange subjects him to experience at the hands of the younger and more frisky brokers which soon remind him of the vicissitudes of his Freshman year in college. The World says that when a new member made his appearance recently he was "greeted with howls of delight." His hat was promptly knocked off, and other men's hats were banged on to his head, some of them stopping on his crown, and others going down till they were stopped by his ears or nose. The account continues: "Then they rushed him around the room, and bitterly lamented the fact that the table which used to stand in front of the rostrum had been removed, for it used to be one of the features of a man's initiation to be laid on his back on this table, which was fastened securely to the floor, and then his tormentors, taking his arms and legs, spun him round and round like a pin-wheel. They tore his coat, and chalked him all over with strange signs, till at last in despair he offered as all his newly acquired seat for easy much less than he paid for it." Three other gentlemen who were admitted as members-ship on the same day failed to appear on the floor, and no wonder.

There are at least a few places in the world where rats are appreciated by men. In the lower levels of the Nevada mines the old miners neither kill the rats nor suffer them to be harmed by others. These rodents are the scavengers of the mines. They pick the bones and bones thrown away by the men, and devour such scraps of food as would vitiate the hot air of the mines if left to decay. They also give warning when a "cave" is about to take place. The miners believe that the rats detect the settling of the ground before the crashing of timbers is heard, for they come out on the floor and scamper about uneasily. If rats come into a new drift or cross-cut, their presence is taken as a sign of a good field. "The other day," says the Virginia City Enterprise, "when the men were at work on the face of a new cross-cut on the 2700-foot level of the Sierra Nevada Mine, a rat came in to them, travelling along the line of the compressed air pipe. What the little rodent was once some of the new hands wanted to kill it, but the old miners would not allow it to be hurt. They said it would bring luck to the cross-cut. So they fixed up in the roof of the drift a hut as a house for the rat, and placed food near at hand, in order that it might find its own quarters profitable as well as comfortable. There is much talk among the miners about the coming of this rat, and the men in the new cross-cut are very proud of it, and have high hopes on account of its presence."

WASHED ASHORE.

See double-page illustration.

"He was found at the shoreline?" "Yes" "And his name is?" "Jacques Minot."
"Where did he live?" "At the fishers' village, about a mile below."
"Was he born in the village?" "Yes; he has lived there all his life."
"Married?" "Yes, mounsieur." "How many children? Where is his wife?"

"Ah, monsieur, that is the sorrow. Poor Babetta died last year;
And there are six little children. The youngest stands by me here.
She is half afraid, you see, of what lies there on the shore Afraid of her father! Poor child, she never feared him before!"

"Who cares for the children? Will they go to friends, or the state?"
Paul Lettering rose from his knees: "He was my friend and my mate;
Mate and brother and friend, I've been promising poor Jacques now
I would care for the children; and, comrades, you know I bear my vow."
"Good. You may bury him, then, poor fellow. A man so brave
Methinks should have found in the sea he loved a clean deep grave;
But the sea's a cruel mistress, and scornfully flings ashore
The broken life and the broken clay of him who sails no more."

"Nay, monsieur, the sea is faithful; she knew our Jacques would rest
Better beside the little church, with the cross upon his breast;
Would rather lie by his Babetta; for though the church-yard grass
The feet of the kindly father-folk and his little children pass.

"'Tis the winds that are cruel, monsieur; the sea—the sea loves men:
When the cruel winds leave her alone, she does for him all she can;
And when they lash her to fury, and she can do no more,
She bears the poor dead fishermen safe to his own home-shore."
So the gentlemen wrote of Jacques Minot: "Found drowned, and washed ashore."

APPROACHING THE TRUTH.

CHAPTER II.

A GUESS.

JOHN WOODHATCH did not reply in any way to Miss Brake's wish that the coming of Lucy might be delayed. The remark was not intended for his ears, and he was gentleman enough at least to affect that he had not heard it. He wondered a little why Miss Brake should object to the visit of the Larcenes; one of his little plans had been to draw Lucy and Hester Brake together be the commencement of their one home. They were related, too—there seemed nothing in the world to keep them at arm's-length, and presently this ailing, freckled, warm-hearted little woman would need sisterly help and solace. Kitty would be easy with her husband at Tolland's farm then, and Hester Brake would be very much alone.

He had professed to be in good spirits that evening, but her questioning had somewhat disturbed him. She had asked him baldly whether he was still in love with Lucy, and he had replied at once that he was, but the conversation had not tended to keep the good spirits of which he had boasted to their abnormal level. In his "heart of hearts" he had objected a little to the question, but Hester Brake was a "privileged" friend who had known the secret of his life, had even guessed at it shrewdly before the truth came out at the inquest, and the truth was still that he loved the fair, sad young widow, and would have brightened her life if he could: even by the sacrifice of his own life, if in any way it could have cheered her own, he could have said without reach hesitating.

"It is getting late," he said, restless now "Have you anything more to say, Hester—to ask?"

"Why?"

"Why!" repeated Woodhatch, rising. "Because we are early folk in Farm Forlorn, and these are late hours for us."

Miss Brake looked at her watch.

"Yes, it is getting late," she said; "but there was one subject to which I had intended to allude. You have put it out of my head with your talk of these Larcenes."

"Of old Alec and your sister-in-law," he said, mildly, "not 'these Larcenes' exactly Well, what is it you want to cross-examine me upon?"

"I have no more questions to ask, John. Sit down," she said, "I can not look up as you and shout my wishes."

"Oh! they are wishes now, are they?" said John, lightly. "Well, five minutes to attend to them."

He sat down by her side now, in a second chair that was handy, and she laid her hand upon his arm The expression of her face was very fixed and earnest, and had strange meanings in it, which he could not guess at, he was sure already.

"John," she said, "for many years I have believed you a just man—a man who has suffered from injustice, I might add, and been above resenting it. I don't think it is in your heart to bear malice, is it?"

"I don't think it is," he said, smiling, and endeavoring to regard her preface lightly. "Who is the party who says I am malicious?"

"No one."

"Ah! that's all right," was his reply.

"But you are unforgiving."

"Hester, you are laying yourself open to an action for libel; but there, I forgive you, at any rate"

"You are unforgiving," she continued, "and you are aware of it. The man who has injured you, as slighted you, as put a false construction on your actions, you turn against at once. You would do him no harm, but—"

"But I should not be anxious to ask him to dinner, or subscribe to a testimonial for him, or lend him a hundred pounds. Well, no. If he has a bad opinion of me," he said, shrugging his shoulders, "let him keep it, but at a respectful distance from me. Why should I seek the company of a man who would treat me vilely if he could, and who, when I was at my best, perhaps, thought the very worst of me? What good is he to me?"

"And you would not forgive him," said Miss Brake.

"How do you know, Miss Persistency?"

"And," she went on, "I want you to forgive one poor weak fellow who has sinned against your pride, and is very penitent, I am sure. Whose life your sternness has wrecked already, I am afraid."

John Woodhatch was quick to seize the motive of all this.

"You mean Reuben Fladge?"

"Yes."

"He was led away by Morris, and talked into playing the spy, but I forgave him on that night, and would have seen to his future had he let me—had he not grown desperate, and—"

"And killed my brother That is what you think is your heart," she said, with excitement. "Is that out now—tell me?"

"So on here come round to the old ghastly subject," said Woodhatch. "When will you set it aside?"

"Presently. I am a new-comer here. Put up with me John, and my associations conjured up by the farm, for a little while," she said. "And now—you think this Fladge killed my brother?"

"I am no man's judge"

"But you suspect him. From the very first you suspected that poor half-witted lad"

"Who tells you this?"

"Fladge himself."

"Where have you seen him?"

"No matter; I have seen him," was the reply "More than once I have given him money, and kind words, which he values more than money And," she added, "he did not kill my brother, I am convinced"

"I should be glad to be convinced of that too," muttered Woodhatch.

"I want you to take my word for it: I, who never in my life deceived you, and whose word you could always trust," she said "Will you do this?"

"Because you take Fladge's word for it," said the farmer, moodily. "But that is no reason why I should."

"Oh, you are terribly obstinate!" said Hester. "It is your besetting sin; it will be so to the end Why don't you believe what I say?"

"You keep something back from me," was the sharp reply.

"For the present, yes; but," she added, "only for the present."

"You think you have a clew Ah! Hester, many shrewder heads than yours have thought so too."

"Trust me."

"Who has been bewildering and exciting you with sentiments most likely to prove false? Come, now, confess," he urged; "for you are out often like this."

"I will tell you presently."

"Not now?"

"Not now"

"Then I will forgive Fladge presently, too," said Woodhatch, quietly; "when there is any proof in his favor with which a man may grapple."

"You drive me to extremes by your doubts," she cried, angrily "You will not give me time to prove the truth independently, and I insist have time"

"I have said some one has disturbed your mind, Hester, for a purpose of his own, knowing how credulous you are. Where is this Fladge" asked John Woodhatch. "When did you see him last"

"Don't ask me any more questions," she said, wearily

"I will not. I am glad to end the subject, and should be very glad to know it was not Fladge who killed poor Morris. And now, Hester, good-night to you"

"Good-night," she replied, in a low, offended tone, as she rose and walked across the room without looking at him again. She paused before Kate Vanch, and touched her shoulder. The game at draughts was finished, and the betrothed couple had been conversing together quietly and confidentially

"You are the best of friends, I see," she said, lightly "Come, Kate, I am tired, and need rest to-night."

Kitty sprang up at once, and Hester Brake placed her hand upon her arm

"Good-night, Greg," said Kate, with a bright smile as him.

"Good-night, Kitty," he answered, as cheerily, as they shook hands together, "and good-night, Miss Brake."

"Yours is certainly like a voice I have heard before," said Miss Brake, in lieu of her salutation in response. "Where could it have been?"

"I can not give you any information," said Greg, smiling; "I wish it was in my power." Then he opened the door for her and Kitty to pass through, bowed again, and closed the door behind them.

He did not return to his place, but walked to the window where John Woodhatch was sitting, pipe in hand, and the tobacco burning away by itself in the bowl.

"I think I will bid you good-night also, Mr Woodhatch," he said. "It will have to be early rising to-morrow to see to the seven-acre lot."

"Yes, we must clear it to-morrow, Greg."

"It shall be done, sir."

"Good-night."

"Good-night, Mr. Woodhatch."

Greg had expected for the last day or two that the master would have asked him about Kitty Vanch, and of his feelings regarding her, now that she was part and parcel of his life, and a new addition to the home here, but Mr. Woodhatch did not broach the subject; on the contrary, he said, almost sharply,

"When did you see Fladge last, Greg?"

"Fladge?" repeated Greg, in surprise.

"Yes; I have him on my mind to-night."

Greg hesitated for an instant.

"Now you mention it, sir, I am reminded that he was seen in the village yesterday."

"Who saw him?"

"One of the servants told me this morning she found him at old Spilkins's when she took the beef ten round," said Greg.

"Ah! I see."

Greg glanced at the farmer, who looked thoughtfully out-of-doors, and said no more upon the question. Taking this as a hint to go, the favorite pupil withdrew, and John Woodhatch stood up and stretched his arms out as though the day's work as the conversation with Brake had wearied him very much. He was closing the open window, when a thin, claw-like hand touched his arm and sought to draw him, as if against his will, into the shadows of the garden and out of the range of the lights within the room.

"Master," said Mrs. Chadderton, in a husky whisper, "it is all found out. You must go away at once"

CHAPTER III.

THE OLD SUPERSTITION.

THE master of Farm Forlorn was startled for an instant, then his hand responded to the clutch of the housekeeper, and the position was quickly reversed. By his superior strength, the grasp of his iron fingers which encircled bristly and closely on the fingers of Mrs. Chadderton, he drew that estimable and watchful lady into the room from the dark garden ground wherein she had been concealed.

"What a bad habit you have of lurking about and listening, Mrs Chadderton" he said, coolly "What is the matter with you?"

Mrs. Chadderton, once in the house, was released. She closed the shutters with a quick hand, went to the door of the room, looked out into the corridors, and then returned with a feline step to the side of John Woodhatch. She was deathly white, he saw now, and her slight frame was shaking very violently

"I have not spoken before; I have not said a word of this before," she whispered, fiercely, to him. "Oh, master! my dear old master, who has befriended me so much and saved so many more deserving, I ask you, beg you, pray to you to go away from here Pray do, for God's sake, for your own, don't stop another day"

"Mrs Chadderton, you are as mad as a March hare, or—"

And then he stopped and looked closely into her face.

"No, I have not been drinking," said the housekeeper; "for years I have never touched a drop of drink You know that."

"No, you're sober; then, old girl, you must be mad," he said, "or ill, or walking in your sleep"

"No, no, no," she answered. "Don't speak so loudly, don't you whisper, as that—so that if any body was at the door they could not hear what we were saying"

John Woodhatch frowned.

"They may hear anything I have to say, and welcome"

"Ah! you don't know," she cried; "you don't see—you won't see—how the net is closing round you."

"Go on," said the master, calmly.

"That woman known—that hateful woman whom you brought to this house—"

"Hateful! You call her hateful?" said Woodhatch, in a tone of stern reproof. "Try and remember."

"Yes, yes, but I only remember now she is your bitterest enemy," cried the housekeeper; "she is deceiving you and all the rest. Oh, sir, I wouldn't say so—I would never have said a word—if I were not quite sure. You know me well enough for that, and after all these years of faithful service to you."

John Woodhatch set down his pipe, and rested his two big brown hands on the shoulders of the woman, generally so quiescent and passive and grim, and saw more like a madwoman than ever, as he had told her that she must be.

"Listen to me, Mother Chadderton, will you?"

"I am listening," she answered; "I will not lose a single word. But please don't speak so loud."

"You are an old servant here, and we have not many secrets from each other," said John Woodhatch "You know my life, you think; I know yours, I am sure. And there has been on your mind, then, for five long years, the murder of Morris Brake?"

"Yes."

"And you think I killed him," he said—"say, you are sure I killed him?"

She did not attempt to prevaricate, she looked down, and answered again, "Yes."

"And you are still my friend! You do not shrink away from the hands red with blood that hold you to your faith in me, despite it all?" he said, wonderingly.

"No, I do not shrink," she answered, boldly "I saw how he stood in your way, how he had deceived you, robbed you of the one woman who could have blessed your life, and made it all so different. I saw how your heart was wrung—how you suffered"

"You know nothing about it. I—"

"Oh! don't tell me anything; don't say a word, but let me ease you," she entreated. "Let me swear you were never away from the house that night; that you were ill, and I attended to you; that— Oh, good God! let me be in some way of help. That is all I want, sir; nothing more than that."

"You don't blame me, then?" he said.

"Blame you—no. Why should I?"

He released his hold of her, and shuddered for an instant.

"You are a terrible woman, Mrs. Chadderton," he said, with a laugh that had not much merriment in it: "you would screen even a murderer, then, from the Hands of Justice?"

"With all my heart, if that murderer was John Woodhatch."

"As you are sure he is."

She did not answer again; she wrung her hands together and looked down, after her old fashion. And he did not repeat his question; he only regarded her sorrowfully, even very regretfully, and said

"Tell me your news. Where is my danger?" Mrs. Chadderton gesticulated wildly.

"She was in the village alone the night before her visit here. She went to the cottages on the low level," the housekeeper exclaimed.

"Miss Brake?"

"Yes."

"What did she want?"

"Spilkins sent for her," was the answer.

"How did you learn this?"

"From Reuben Fladge. He has been here to-night," she went on, speaking with an uncommon rapidity of utterance; "it dawned even upon him there might be danger to the master, and more so to him he had guessed at."

"What did Spilkins say to Miss Brake?"

"I don't know," she said, helplessly.

"Does Fladge?"

"He does not. He was sent out of the cottage," was the answer; "but the object of the meeting was to tell this woman who killed Morris Brake"

"You are sure of that?"

"Quite sure."

"And Spilkins knows who was the murderer?"

"Yes, for certain," replied Mrs Chadderton.

"I will go to him," said John Woodhatch. "It is important I should see that man"

"You are losing time," murmured the housekeeper

"No; I'm gaining it," said John Woodhatch. "You see he will be more easy to get away from Spilkins's house, Ann Chadderton. There will not be so many to notice which way I have gone."

"Yes—yes—but—" And then Mrs. Chadderton stopped as John Woodhatch broke into a laugh which sounded very strangely at that hour of the night, and seemed to ring throughout the farm.

"Hush! hush!" she exclaimed. "Why are you laughing at me? Where is the fun, to such a time as this?"

"You will not see I am jesting with you," he said, "and that this murder story has affected you for nothing"

"Ah! you are beyond me. I do not make you out, master," she said, with a deep sigh. "I would help you at all hazards if I could. I am not thinking of the murder, or caring for it. I only care for your escape."

"Did Spilkins tell Miss Brake I was the murderer?"

"I do not know," she said again.

"Has he ever said to you he thought I was?"

"I have never listened to him All I know is, he was abroad that night when I sat up for you, and must have seen you," she said, in a lower tone of voice.

"Seen me on the sands, then, walking down the disappointment of my life, Ann Chadderton—nothing more than that. It is strange," he said, regarding her reproach fully, "that you should think so badly of me as to set me down as the assassin of a youth who shared my home, and of whom I was proud. I did not kill Morris Brake, woman—I would have rather killed myself"

"They may accuse you all the same," she answered, in a passive tone.

It appeared to be a matter of complete indifference to her whether John Woodhatch had killed Morris Brake or not. It was his safety which concerned this woman, nothing else.

"Will you believe me?" he asked, sharply.

"Yes," she said at once.

"And bear in mind, too, that Miss Brake has no suspicion of me"

"She knows who is the murderer—I heard her say so—and I—I thought she must have meant you, sir, Spilkins knowing, and I knowing—"

"Nothing," said John Woodhatch, interrupting her "See here"

He drew from his pocket the envelope containing Miss Brake's will, and held it up before her astonished gaze.

"She has entrusted me with this to-night—probably has left me all her money in it. This is the will of Hester Brake," he said.

"Indeed!"

"Yes—indeed it is."

"After all, this may be a trick," she said, very eagerly, "to put you off your guard."

John Woodhatch stamped his foot, and then broke into a laugh again.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1361.

"If you were not a woman I should shake you," he said, bluntly, "but you are a poor creature with only one idea. There! go to bed, and leave the outer door on the latch; I may be late."

"Late, sir?"

"Yes, we are late people sometimes at Farm Forlorn, and proof at night like wild beasts. But then the farm is a wild beast's den—in you."

"Forgive me. I have tried to think for the best for many years. Always," she said, in a trembling voice again, "what is the best for you, and as a return—my poor return, alas—for all you have done for me."

"There! there! we will not discuss that question ever again. You can only show your gratitude," he said, "by speaking well of me."

"That I have always done."

"What!" he exclaimed, "when you thought I had killed poor Morris?"

"That did not matter to me," said Mrs. Chaddleton, stolidly. "You might have thought it right to kill him, and you would have known as much better than any of us—"

"Good-night, Mrs. Chaddleton," he said, dryly. "You will want a deal of improvement yet before you are quite fit for the highest society."

"Are you going to Spikins?"

"Yes. If he thinks I did it, he must not slip out of the world with that idea; and if he knows who did," he added, with a frown, "he shall tell me as well as Hester Brake."

He locked the will in a cupboard by the empty fire-place, and then strode out of the farm in search of the old man who had had no confidence in John Woodhatch, and so had preferred to trust a woman. A most remarkable man this Spikins, thought the farmer as he went along his garden, and not of the front gate into the high-road, where he took the route which Greg and Hester Brake had taken a few nights ago. He walked very swiftly, being a tall man, prone to long strides when business was brisk or thought was deep with him, and here was one matter to be settled off-hand and at a high pressure.

Whom should he fairly understand human nature? he thought, as he marched on; when would human nature understand him or award him common justice? To think that this quite honest-keeper of his had set him down as a murderer, and had constituted it her duty in every way to screen him! To fancy "for even a moment" that old Spikins on his dying bed—by way of confession which might have its terrible weight with a skeptical world—should have raved out that the master of Farm Forlorn had killed his pupil out of spite. He was not quite sure what would be the result of that outcry, or how the meshes might close roof him for all the light way in which he had treated it half an hour ago. But he could not think for long that Spikins and Miss Brake had him upon their minds. It was not likely, it was not natural; but it was necessary to know what this poor old dotard had upon his mind—the little mind which old age had left to him.

He reached the rough hewn path leading into the darkness of the lower ground, and plunged into the shadows without a moment's thought and at the same quick pace. To his surprise there were figures flitting in the darkness, men and women chattering there as if it were midday, and trotting to and fro, a few of them.

"Mister Woodhatch—is that you, sir?" came an inquire at last in the broad provincial accent; "us have heard the news then, sir, a'ready?"

"What news?"

"He's gone at last, poor soul?"

"Spikins?"

"Yes, sir. He went off like the snuff of a candle," said the man in the dark, "all of a sudden like, just as Reuben was feeding him with a teaspoon and a-boilerin' at him for biting it. Well," was the remark, "he's had a good beatage, and can't complain where he's a-gone to."

"No, he can not complain," said Woodhatch; then he walked to the last cottage, pushed open the door, and joined a group of sight-seers who were already there staring down at the still white figure in the bed—more dignified in death than it had ever been in life.

"He's gone, sir," said Fladge, who had been at the bed's foot, "and he won't want me even again."

And without another word, and with a half-wistful, half-frightened look at the old rooster, who had scared him by his sudden presence there, Fladge attempted to walk past and drift into the night away from him.

But the strong hand of the master caught him by the wrist, and a voice here spoke and hard than in had expected fell upon his ears.

"Stay, Fladge. I want you," said John Woodhatch.

CHAPTER IV.

THE VERDICT.

A few days after the death of Peter Spikins, whose sudden departure from this vale of tears was pronounced to be an especial "mercy," particularly by those retainers of John Woodhatch who had had the privilege to attend to him, "turn and turn about"—Alexander Larcom and his daughter Lucy arrived at Farm Forlorn.

It was close upon five years since they had visited the place, but the farmer's perseverance—his pertinacity—had brought them once more within the farm-house walls. Lucy Brake had given way at last, and consented to accompany her father, although this had occurred probably not so much for John Woodhatch's sake as on account of a letter received from Hester Brake, asking her to come, and begging that she would not delay her visit, as she was anxious to make friends with her.

"It was not a happy first meeting, and I would make amends for it," Hester Brake wrote frankly, and then disarmed her young sister-in-law at once. "After all, she is Morris's sister, and he would have been glad to see us friends," said Lucy to her father. "Let us go."

Before the week was out they were located at their old quarters; the ice was broken, and the new home circle at Farm Forlorn was quite complete. And the woman who one night had whispered to herself, "Not yet, I hope," when told by John Woodhatch of the possibility of Lucy's visit, was the first to welcome her, and appear very glad to see her.

"I was afraid you would never come, as that you would come too late," said Hester Brake.

"Too late—for what?"

"You understand me."

John Woodhatch shrugged his shoulders as he walked away. He had heard the salutation, and marvelled at it not a little.

"Of a surety, I shall never comprehend these women," he soliloquized as he crossed the fields after the interview. "What makes them such 'little cattle,' I wonder?"

Had he listened more, he would have had less to be perplexed at, for Hester Brake explained the position satisfactorily enough to Lucy, if after her eccentric fashion.

"I have so many things to talk to you about, and I may not have much time before me," she said; "see how thin that hand is."

She held it up toward the sun for her sister-in-law's inspection.

"I am not going to live very long," Hester added, "and, after all, it is better for me."

"You must not think that," said Lucy. "You are young still—comparatively."

"Compared with poor old Spikins who died last week—oh yes!" she said, sharply; "but then I have not the constitution of old Spikins. We Brakes die early."

"Oh!" exclaimed Lucy, as though an arrow had struck her.

"I beg pardon; I talk at random," said Hester, hastily. "See what an inconsiderate woman I am, and always in the wrong. Where is Mr. Larcom?"

Lucy looked hard at her, remembering the past suspicions of her father, and Miss Brake said, more hastily still:

"I wish to ask his pardon for the one suspicion I have had of him. You know."

"Yes," answered Lucy; "I have not forgotten."

"I was in the wrong. And," she added, "I have never been backward in confessing my errors. Ask Kate Vanch—ask John Woodhatch, if I am."

"I am only too glad to take your own word for it," said Lucy, a new friend on the instant, and for the first time in her life she stooped and kissed Miss Brake in gratitude for the amende honorable which had been made to her. Then she tripped away with a brighter look upon her face, and went in search of Morice, who it need hardly be said was also a guest at Farm Forlorn, and who had already found out her old companion of the sands, Kitty Vanch, and was romping with her in all the exuberance of happy childhood.

Lucy felt her heart sink a little at the sight of them—as she had done by the sea-shore—for there was only this child to live for, she thought, in her morbid devotion to her, and what if it should happen that some day Morice should love some one better than herself, when Morice grew up even? Why, it would break her heart!

"You are fond of children, Miss Vanch," said Lucy, as she approached them. "I think you told me this when I first met you."

"Yes, I dare say I did," answered Kitty; "and this child would be so bright if she had more companions of her own age, probably."

"Morice does not want any more companions," said Lucy. "She is contented with her mother."

"Yes—of course; but then the mother should not be quite all in all—should she, Mrs. Brake?" said Kitty, thoughtfully. "for the mother might die, or be separated from her in some way, or—but there! I don't know, I can't say. I have no remembrance of a mother ever looking down upon me as you look at her."

"Poor girl!" and Lucy's hand stole out and touched Kate's in sympathy.

"And your mother, madam?"

"She died when I was a baby. I never saw her; I can not imagine what she was like," said Lucy.

Kate Vanch seemed strangely drawn to this beautiful, almost desolate, young woman. Indeed, there were many reasons why she should feel attracted by her, and was ambitious to gain her friendship—she had heard as much of Lucy Brake, and knew as much more than Lucy would have given her credit for knowing.

"I hope we may be friends, some day," said Kitty, frankly, "and that when Greg and I are married you will see her as entirely as a friend as."

"Would you care to see me then?" asked Lucy.

"Yes, indeed I would. I have thought I should like to be a humble but true friend of yours," said Kitty, "even before I had seen you; I used to think that."

"Indeed!" said Lucy, interested and astonished; "and how was that?"

"I had heard you were so pretty, and good, and clever."

"From Morris?" came the eager question now.

"Oh no! you were secretly married, and he did not mention you very often to his sister," said Kitty. "It was from Mr. Woodhatch, of course."

"Ah, yes, yes; I had forgotten John," said Lucy.

"Forgotten him!" cried Kitty.

"Did he speak of me as much, then, years ago?" asked Lucy, looking coldly on the ground.

"He spoke of little else," said Kate, frankly; "and of course I knew—everybody knew."

"Mine has been a prodigious life, and has troubled others a great deal," said Lucy, more coldly; "and you must not speak of this again."

"I beg your pardon if I have said anything to pain you."

"It is granted, and readily."

"I—I have a bad habit of speaking out, of saying what is in my thoughts," Kitty explained; "and your coming has made me more abrupt than usual in my speech. And perhaps I have not improved lately, as Greg is something like me in that way."

"Greg is frank, then?"

"He has not a secret from me in the world."

"That is very good of him. I admire perfect confidence."

"Part of this habit of speaking out we have both learned from the master. That is it, I suppose," said Kitty, after a moment's reflection; "he is our model, and we copy him."

"Does he teach you to talk in this way, and about himself?"

"Oh no," said Kitty, coloring; "but you—you do not mind my mentioning his name to you. You can not hate him, surely."

"I have a great respect for him. He is my father's friend and mine, and I should be glad to see him happy; and," she added, after a moment's pause, "that is all. Come, Morice dear, bid Miss Vanch good-by for the present."

"Good-be," said Morice, holding up her rose-bud mouth to be kissed by her new friend; and then mother and child strolled away, and Kate Vanch stood looking after Lucy Brake.

"How pretty she is!" she murmured; "how young and fair, and unlike everybody else at Skegs Shore! Why did not my steady old faithful Greg fall in love with her, and forget me al together? What would Kitty Vanch have done then, I wonder?"

WILLIAM A. SEAVER.

MR. WILLIAM A. SEAVER, whose sudden death on the 7th instant was a surprise and shock to all his friends, was born in Albany, New York, March 10, 1816. His parents removed to Batavia while he was in his infancy, and there he was brought up and educated. His first venture of any importance was in connection with the Buffalo Courier, of which he was for several years the editor.

MR. SEAVER came to New York more than twenty years ago, and occupied himself with literary pursuits. He was at one time editor of a Church journal in this city, and corresponded for several newspapers in the South and West. In 1856 he was placed in charge of the "Editor's Drawer," in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, a position for which he was well qualified by his acquaintance with men, his position in society, and his rare aptitude as a raconteur. The "Drawer" is literally what the name implies. When this department was first projected, in the summer of 1851, the clippings and contributions intended for it were thrown into a drawer of a certain desk, and this circumstance suggested the name. The same method has been pursued ever since that time. The contributions for this department of the MAGAZINE, which come from every part of the country, are still deposited in the drawer, whence the editor takes them and culls his selections. Many of the contributions are merely crude suggestions, and MR SEAVER displayed the tact in editing, condensing, as enlarging them. For many years MR SEAVER also conducted the "Personal" department in HARPER'S BAZAR and HARPER'S WEEKLY, the latter until the last week of his life. On the Wednesday preceding his death his "copy" came to the office, written in his usual clear and remarkably neat hand, and the editor, glancing over the familiar MS., had little thought that it was the last he should receive from his long time associate.

MR SEAVER was for some years President of the Adriatic Fire-Insurance Company, of this city, and was also a member of the New York bar. He belonged to the Union Club, where his presence was always welcome, for his genial social qualities and his inexhaustible fund of anecdote and story. He resided in a pleasant cottage at Mount Vernon, where he had gathered an extensive and well-selected library. The cause of his death was acute pneumonia.

A SLEIGH-RIDE IN NORWAY.

DINNER ended, and by the time the coffee and cigars have been consumed, in Norse fashion, with the ladies, the stars are already twinkling from the dark blue Northern sky. We hear the stamping and neighing of the horses as the sleighs are being brought round to the hall door. You finish your cigar—it is too cold to smoke out-of-doors—and get into your fur coat, made from the fell of a Norwegian wolf; top-boots lined with soft sheep-skin, fur gloves; and to crown it all, a bear-skin cap drawn over your ears; and you feel fit for a drive to the north pole.

You see that the ladies and children in the roomy family sleigh are well wrapped up in bear-skin and foot-bags, but your interest is concentrated more on your own "fare," the girl from whose eyes you late night in the dance drank three sweet but painful draughts of uncertain love, who now again trusts herself to your guiding arm, and this time to curb the capricious temper of a Norwegian sleigh-trotter. Carefully you embalm her in the light spade skinde, or point sleigh; you examine the way the furs and the harness with great care, stroke the arching neck of the animal, with an encouraging word, and take your seat on the perch behind. "Let him go, Gustaf."

And you are off along the hard-trodden road with the speed of an avalanche, whilst the frosty air whistles around you, and makes the blood for a moment tingle in your cheeks, and you feel, through the rapid motion, a delight and internal exuberance of spirits, which is equally shared by the fair companion before you, as you speed through the glistening snow. How you bless the inventor of that vehicle, whose genius has created this pleasant little gondola of the snow for your individual benefit, in which you may be so near the object of your affection, watch every play of her capricious nature in her shadowed eyes, and inhale that sweet perfume so delicious and intoxicating to every lover! Yes, how many tales of true love here has been told in a Norwegian point sleigh, and treasured forever by the fair listener!

And what a scene, what an impressive atom of nature's creation you gaze on! High above you in the vaulted arch of the deep blue heavens, the color of which you will only see near the polar circle, and which is closely studded by innumerable silvery stars. There in the merry polar star right above you, round which the "Great Bear" walks his nightly beat, followed in solemn procession by the voiture Orion, who lifts his glistening glaive against the frontlet of the defiant Bull; while in! just above the crowns of the pine-trees in the forest yonder a brilliant star arises. A visitor from a milder clime, and always seen in the Northern sky, the Dogstar, the vigilant Sirius of the Greeks; and across the heavens is cast a broad ribbon shining with myriads of invisible worlds, the Milky Way, along which the valorous Scandinavian Kämper, the gallant warriors of the Saga, rode to Walhalla, the portals of which you see encircled by the varied segment of the aurora borealis, whose fiery rays erratically flood the heavens with a thousand colors and fantastic shapes of liquid flame. And around you in the scenery of a Norwegian landscape, with its hills and dales bemantled in virgin snow, in which the distant mountains recline in bold relief on the dark background, which also lovers the solemn pine-trees, under whose snow laden crowns and boughs we are now sweeping, with a mysticism which makes us ponder on the innumerable tales of the goblin and the brownie in which old Norway abounds.

ORIGIN OF "PAUL PRY."

It has often been repeated that Paul Pry was drawn from a familiar figure of the time, the eccentric Tom Hill, editor of the Dramatic Mirror.

MR John Poole, the author of the delightful comedy, expressly contradicts this in a little biographical sketch of himself which he addressed to one of the managers of the period. "The idea of the character of Paul Pry was suggested," he says, "by the following anecdote, related to me several years ago by a beloved friend. An idle old lady, living in a narrow street, had passed on much of her time in watching the affairs of her neighbors that she at length knew the sound of each particular knocker within hearing, and could tell to which house it belonged. It happened that she fell ill, and was for several days confined to her bed. Unable to observe in person what was going on outside, she stationed her maid at the window as her substitute for the performance of that task. But Betty soon grew weary of the occupation, she became careless in her reports, impatient and testy when reprimanded for her negligence. 'Betty, whin are you thinking about?' Don't you hear a double knock at No. 9? Who is it?' 'The first floor lodger, ma'am.' 'Betty! Betty! I declare I must give you warning. Why don't you tell me what that knock is at No. 9?' 'Why, Lord, ma'am, it is only the baker with pies.' 'Pies! Betty? What can they want with pies at No. 9? They had pies yesterday.' Of this very point I have availed myself. Let me add that Paul Pry was never intended as the representative of any one individual, but of a class. Like the melancholy Jacques, he 'is compounded of many simples,' and I could mention five or six who were unconscious contributors to the character. That it should have been so often though erroneously supposed to have been drawn after some particular person is perhaps complimentary to the general truth of the delineation. With respect to the play generally, I may say that it is original; it is original in structure, plot, character, and dialogue—such as they are. The only imitation I am aware of is to be found in part of the business in which MRS. Subtle is engaged; whilst writing those scenes I had strongly in my recollection Collin d'Harleville's Vieux Célibataire. But even the little I have adopted is considerably altered and modified by the necessity of adapting it to the exigencies of a different plot."

METHODISM IN BROOKLYN.

LORD MACAULAY said that he had seen a book purporting to be a history of England, that made no mention of JOHN WESLEY. Not only is religion, as one of the great forces moulding the fashion of society, to be taken into the account in estimating the condition of a community, but the character and relative influence of the several forms into which religion may divide itself are also to be considered. Especially is this necessary to a state of society like ours, in which all religions are alike unobstructed in the propagation of their views, and in the enforcement of their respective moral and social practices. Twelve thousand persons holding a positive form of belief, and professing to be governed by defined rules of moral conduct, distributed through the several departments of active life, must exert an appreciable influence upon the morals, admiration, trade, and politics of the community. The state of Methodism, therefore, is not a mere sentimental question, affecting only the devout sister who breathes out the fervor of her spirit in a plain-meeting, or the stalwart parson who thunders from his pulpit on the terrors of the Law, but in one of practical interest to the citizen, the philosopher, and the political economist.

There are now thirty nine Methodist Episcopal churches in the city of Brooklyn. Of these nearly one-half have come into existence within the past twenty-five years. The increase of members in these churches has with remarkable uniformity kept pace with the general growth of the city. In 1847 the numbers were 4122, and in 1882, 11,700, being in each case about two per cent. of the entire population. The value of church property has increased at a greater ratio, being in 1847 a little more than one-third of one per cent. of the assessed value of the real estate of the city, while in 1882 it was a little more than one-half of one per cent., showing an increase of the value of church property, as related to the aggregated wealth of the city, of about fifty per cent. As related to the number of communicants the advance has been still greater, the increase of members in the twenty-five years being threefold, and the increase of property being fivefold, as the figures would show, but in so short an article we must deal sparingly with statistics. The contributions to the benevolent and religious institutions of the Church during the same period have advanced in proportion to the growth of members, but not in proportion to the growth of wealth. It must not, however, be forgotten that large sums have been contributed within the above-named period to the great educational and philanthropic institutions of the country. The thoughts of every reader of these words will at once revert to the distinguished citizen of Brooklyn whose princely munificence has spread his name throughout the entire land, and caused the heart of every Methodist to beat with pride and gratitude.

The territorial growth of Methodism has of course followed the current of the population, which, reversing the order of the star of empire, has held its way eastward instead of westward. The older churches still maintain their ground in the older parts of the city, laboring, under great discouragements, for the salvation of the poor and the ignorant. The new churches correspond in character with the improved neighborhoods in which they are built. In point of architecture they have all aimed more at neatness, convenience, and economy than at elegance. Indeed, the Sommerfield Church, situated on Washington Avenue, and St. John's, in the Eastern District, were, until the erection of Grace Church, the only two having any pretensions to architectural beauty. St. John being the larger, more imposing, and costly edifice, and more complete in the symmetry of its design. The Grace M. E. Church (an engraving of which accompanies this article), situated on Seventh Avenue and St. John's Place, though smaller than some others, is, we think, the most beautiful Methodist Episcopal church in Brooklyn. As described by the architects, Messrs. Pantzer Brothers: "It has one of the most ornate and richly carved exteriors of any church in New York or Brooklyn. The style is an admixture of thirteenth century Gothic with just enough of the Florid to impart to it great richness of detail. The entire front walls are of stone from Martinsville, New Jersey. The trimmings, viz., the small columns and capitals, canopies, pinnacles, cornices, flying buttresses, etc., are of terra cotta of both a light drab and rich brown color. . . . The general form of the interior is rectangular, with a central nave forty-eight feet wide, and two aisles each six feet wide, making the auditorium sixty by ninety feet, with accommodations for about six hundred full-cane sittings." Adjoining the church, and fronting on Seventh Avenue, and forming part of the architectural structure, is the chapel and Sunday-school room, built in the same style, and finished with the same degree of elegance. The whole is furnished with highly ornate cathedral glass windows. Behind the pulpit is a fine organ, built by Hook & Hastings, of Boston. The entire cost of the church is about $70,000. The erection of this complete and beautiful edifice is highly creditable to the societ that worship in it. They have passed through many vicissitudes since their organization in 1868, when the church was situated on Sterling Place, with a contemplated front on Seventh Avenue, and was known as the "Seventh Avenue M. E. Church." But with the true heroism of faithful men, aided by the indefatigable exertions of their pastor, the Rev. George P. Mains, they have risen superior to adverse circumstances, and now present this beautiful edifice to God and the general Church.

The dedication is to take place on Sunday, January 21, on which occasion Bishop Simpson will officiate.

GEORGE F. KETTEL.

EMIGRANTS IN MIDWINTER—MAKING CAMP FOR THE NIGHT.—Drawn by W. A. Rogers.—[See Page 40.]

THE STORY OF A CAT

It's the same with cats as with [illegible]. There's able cats and not able cats, just as there's able seamen and not able seamen. Speaking of able cats reminds me of a story I've heard [illegible] of the H. T. Clifford just as I was [illegible] in reed of in the forepeak or elsewhere.

We found her aboard a derelict hark on about the latitude of Rio, we being homeward bound from Fiji at the time. The hark was the Richard Pendleton, and the captain he gave the same name to the cat. The men also boarded the derelict found the cat sitting on the harness cask as comfortable as you please. He growled when he saw the men, as much as to say "You're been a pestilent long time a-rescuing of me," and then he smiled and showed all his teeth, just to let 'em know that he didn't bear no malice, and went aboard the hoat and came off to the Clifford as dignified as a commodore.

Our doctor—the medical chap, I mean—took a fancy to the cat [illegible] Richard was up [illegible] and would [illegible] he was [illegible] cat [illegible] and [illegible] Richard [illegible] when I kept [illegible] and [illegible] he [illegible] though' [illegible] for half an hour he couldn't [illegible] a pound of old bones and feathers. Richard [illegible] of that's ate as if he had an important engagement on hand back home, and could wait on no account whatever.

Next the cat tackled the captain's parrot, that hung in a cage in the cabin. He thought he was going to have a first-class dinner of roast parrot, but he changed his mind when the parrot tackled him, and making fast to his fore leg, hauled in on it as if he was hoarding the fore tack. I said he was an able cat, and you'd have [illegible] will and sea-at. The steward [illegible] just as his fore-leg was fetching home from the [illegible].

As soon as he was home, away the cat goes forward, and presently he sees a gull on the flying jib-boom. He wasn't a bit dismayed by the parrot, and felt he was able to fetch that gull without more than half trying. So he crept out on the flying jib-boom, and just as he pumps for the gull the gull flies off, and Richard Pendleton goes overboard like a shot.

It was pretty near a dead calm, and as the cat drifted slowly aft one of the men gets a boat hook and fishes him up about the time he comes abreast of the rudder. The man wrings him out, for there was about a bucketful of water soaked into him, and then checks him on the top of the quarter-deck awning to dry.

Richard didn't stay there long. He heard somebody making a remark about tea, and he roused himself and went below to see about it. The steward had just set the table, and there was a jug of milk on it. The cat jams his head into that jug, and when he found he couldn't get his head out again he just capsizes the jug, catches hold of the table-cloth, and pulls everything on to the floor, calculating rightly that the jug would smash and let his head out. When the steward rushed in to see what was the matter he didn't find much cat, for Richard had stowed himself away inside of the captain's particular Stilton cheese, and only the end of his tail was visible.

They found him that night asleep in the box where a passenger that we had, who was consul to some outlandish port, kept his cocked hat. There was a good deal of milk and preserves and mannerelins generally sticking to that cat, and perhaps that was the reason the consul would have have him overboard if the captain hadn't stopped him.

That was only one day's duty that Richard did aboard that ship, but it was a fair sample of his every-day work. Why didn't we heave him overboard? Why, sir, I thought you, being an intelligent man, knew that killing a cat is like praying for the worst kind of luck, and being absolutely certain that you'll get it. If we'd have had there cat overboard, the probability is that the H. T. Clifford would never have come to port again.

A MIDWINTER CAMP.

The hardships endured by emigrants travelling over the Western plains are well represented in the picture on page 44. A small party, apparently a single family, have arrived just at night-fall at the edge of a wood, where they will encamp until morning. While the father breaks the ice on a stream or pond to water the tired horses, the mother collects wood with which to cook supper and keep the "living" wagon warm through the cold and gloomy night. Happy all they be if one of those heavy snow-storms which occur so frequently on the plains does not overwhelm them during the hours of darkness, and turn their camp into a tomb.

It has sometimes happened, especially in earlier years, that a party travelling over the plains in spring, soon after the snow had melted away, have come across the evidences of just such a tragedy—a wagon containing the dead bodies of some family, and close to it the remains of the faithful team that had borne them on their way until overtaken by the storm that buried them. They may have perished without realizing their fate, or they may have suffered for days in the hopeless struggle with the elements.

THE YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. Scurrah Conner, the Governor of Montana, has written an interesting letter to Senator Vast, a member of the Committee on Territories, concerning the Yellowstone Park. This reservation consists of nearly four thousand square miles, and contains some of the sublimest scenery in America. The same causes which make its scenery sublime, and have thus far rendered it a safe refuge for the great game which has almost disappeared from the plains, make it almost useless for any other purpose than that of a national park, for which it has been wisely reserved. There is very little arable land in it, and if it were left open to settlement, it would not be settled. What would happen would be that it would be overrun by "skin hunters" and "bag hunters," whose only aim is to kill the greatest head of game in the shortest time, and who would in a few years exterminate the great game of which the Yellowstone region is now almost the only asylum.

That is precisely what Congress meant to prevent in reserving the region as a park, and that, it seems, is what is likely to happen in spite of the reservation, unless Congress takes some further action. The act reserving the Park provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall provide against the wanton destruction of game, and against its capture or destruction for purposes of profit. The game laws of the Territory of Montana are strict enough, if they are properly enforced, to secure not merely a continuing, but an increased supply of great game, although the game laws of the other Territories contiguous to the Park leave something to be desired. Nevertheless, General Sheridan, in his report for 1882, declares that during last winter not less than two thousand elk were slaughtered within the Park, either wantonly or for their skins. Governor Conner joins General Sheridan in recommending that the limits of the Park be extended to the eastward. He also urges that the game within the Park itself be protected absolutely. He also suggests that an engineer officer be detached to report to the Secretary of the Interior or Superintendent of the Park, with power to call upon the troops when it is necessary to enforce the Park regulations. By these means it is hoped that the overflow of game from the Park will secure a constant supply to the sportsmen of the adjacent Territories.

All this seems very sensible. On the other hand, a company of speculators has been formed, which has applied to Congress for a lease of the whole domain. The object of these persons is, of course, to make the largest possible amount of money out of the Park in the shortest possible time. That object is altogether inconsistent with the purpose of preserving the Park as a public pleasure-ground for us and for posterity, which animated Congress in reserving it from settlement. The lease would be sure to result in spoliations and desecrations from the effect of which the Park would never recover. The application of the speculators ought not to be considered for a moment. How would our children like to witness in the National Park such a scene as the one depicted by Mr. Bierstadt on the opposite page?

Brilliant and Successful AMERICAN NOVELS,

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

I.

A TRANSPLANTED ROSE. A Story of New York Society. By Mrs. M. E. W. Sunnwood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

The story is cleverly told, and gives a picture of metropolitan society which is realistic in the extreme. The author writes from an intimate knowledge, and as she has the gifts of wit and humor, portrays her characters in graphic sketches. A piquant undercurrent of satire serves further to gratify the reader.—Boston Traveller.

It has humor, pathos, and dramatic situations. Although it are fine descriptions, bright reflections, and wise suggestions.—Boston Globe.

There is a great deal about social forms in New York—details about sending cards, introducing people, etc.—Boston Advertiser.

II.

ANNE. A Novel. By CONSTANCE F. WOOLSON. Illustrated by C. S. REINHART. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Miss Woolson adds to her observation an unusual insight into the human heart. Sometimes a fragment, and not an inferior fragment, of the mantle of George Eliot is resting on her capable shoulders.—Century, N. Y.

The scenery is fine, the characterization excellent, and the purpose true. * * * The book has humor also, and plenty of it. * * * "Anne" is full of power, and will not soon be forgotten.—Literary World, Boston.

Clearly a work of genius.—Boston Traveller.

III.

BEN-HUR. A Tale of the Christ. By LEW. WALLACE. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Its real basis is a description of the life of the Jews and Romans at the beginning of the Christian era, and this is both forcible and brilliant * * * We are carried through a surprising variety of scenes; we witness a sea-fight, a chariot-race, the funeral ceremony of a Roman galley, domestic interiors at Antioch, at Jerusalem, and among the tribes of the desert; palaces, prisons, the haunts of dissipated Jewish youth, the house of pious families of Israel. There is plenty of exciting incident; everything is animated, vivid, and glowing.—N. Y. Tribune.

IV.

WASHINGTON SQUARE. By HENRY JAMES, Jr. Illustrated by GEO. DE MAURIER. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

"Washington Square" is a society study rather than a novel, and as such is a delightful piece of analysis, to be ranked with the best works that Mr. James has done.—Boston Traveller

No reader will be likely to lay the book down unfinished.—Boston Courier.

V.

HELEN TROY. By the Author of "Golden Rod." 16mo, Cloth, $1 00

Will bring the author still greater popularity, and will give her an honorable place among American novelists. Her style is crisp and entertaining; the incidents of the story are fresh, and move forward without halting, and the plot, although not a difficult one, is skilfully constructed. All of the characters in the book stand out in their individuality, and are vividly drawn, with sufficient variety and contrast to make them attractive.—Providence Press.

VI.

PHUDENCE. A Story of Æsthetic London. By LUCY C. LILLIE. Illustrated by GEORGE DU MAURIER. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

Æsthetic life in London, in some of its many phases, finds a delightful interpretation in Mrs. Lillie's charming romance. * * * There are many other things to commend "Prudence" besides it merit as a story. It is written in an unassuming style that is specially attractive, its character-portraits are vividly outlined and logically analyzed, its descriptions of London society are artistically touched, a delicate element of satire mingling with the æstheticism, while the whole work is pervaded by an atmosphere of fearlessness and purity that is delightful in its influence.—Providence Journal.

REPORTS OF GOVERNMENT CHEMISTS

As to Purity and Wholesomeness of the Royal Baking Powder.

"I have tested a package of Royal Baking Powder, which I purchased in the open market, and find it entirely free from alum, lime, alkali, or any other injurious substance.
"E. G. LOVE, Ph.D."

"It is a scientific fact that the Royal Baking Powder is absolutely pure.

"I have examined a package of Royal Baking Powder, purchased by myself in the market. I find it entirely free from alum, lime, alkali or any other injurious substance.
"HENRY MORTON, Ph.D., President of Stevens Institute of Technology."

"I have analyzed a package of Royal Baking Powder. The materials of which it is composed are pure and wholesome.
"DANA HAYES, State Assayer, Mass."

"June 28, 1882.—We have made a careful analytical test of Royal Baking Powder, purchased by ourselves in the open market, and in the original package. We find it to be a cream of tartar powder of the highest degree of strength, containing nothing but pure, wholesome, and useful ingredients.
"JOHN H. WAHNER, M.D., Analytical Chemists, St. Louis."
"ALBERT MCHELL, M.D.,"

The Royal Baking Powder received the highest award over all competitors at the Vienna World's Exposition, 1873, at the Centennial Philadelphia, 1876, at the American Institute, and at State Fairs throughout the country.

No other article of human food has ever received such high, emphatic, and universal endorsement from eminent chemists, physicians, [illegible], and Boards of Health all over the world.

NOTE.—The above Diagram illustrates the comparative worth of various Baking Powders, as shown by Chemical Analysis and experiments made by Prof. Schedler. A one-pound can of each powder was taken. The total leavening power or volume to each can calculated, the result being as indicated in the above diagram. This practical test for worth by Prof. Schedler only proves what every observant consumer of the Royal Baking Powder knows by experience, that, while it costs a few cents per pound more than the ordinary kinds, it is far more economical, and, besides, affords the advantage of better work.

A single trial of the Royal Baking Powder will convince any fair minded person of the facts.

"While the [illegible] of these powders to be of a higher degree of strength than other powders, [illegible] to be taken as indicating that they have any value. All alum powders are unhealthful, [illegible] and to be avoided as dangerous.

A TEST FOR 1884.

WHEN the PENDLETON bill came up in the Senate we remarked that it submitted both parties to a severe test, because both had long been making resonant demands for reform, and the country, which had expressed its views at the polls, would watch closely, with a view to 1884, to see which party could be trusted upon the subject. The reform of the civil service, indeed, is not properly a party question. That is to say, it does not involve principles of public policy. It is true that it concerns both the honesty of politics and the national character, and is therefore a question of the highest importance; but so far as it is a matter of legislation it simply provides methods of appointment, promotion, and removal, and regulates administrative detail. Yet while not in its nature essentially a party question, it affects party prosperity. When the country plainly requires a correction of administrative methods, the party that resists and obstructs will certainly suffer. There may be differences of opinion as to the proper interpretation of all that the extraordinary election of the autumn meant. But it is universally agreed that it meant some reform of the spoils system, and Congress has shown plainly enough that it accepted that view.

In this situation true party policy demanded unanimous support of a reasonable measure such as that of the PENDLETON bill. The Republicans have felt this strongly, and have acted accordingly. But the Democrats as a party have been plainly reluctant. Mr. PENDLETON, indeed, moved in the matter two years ago, and introduced a bill, for which he most generously substituted another prepared with care by the friends of reform. The true policy of his party friends was to support him, and, if possible, secure for their party the credit of reform. But when it became a serious practical question, although the Democratic leaders in the Senate sustained him, the real opposition and the opposing votes were Democratic; and although Mr. COX moved to put the bill upon its immediate passage in the House, yet of the forty-seven negative votes forty were Democratic, and one was a Greenbacker's. Meanwhile Democrats elsewhere have foolishly taken a course which tends to identify their party with the old spoils system, and at the very moment when it was sound party policy to dissolve the connection. A large part of the Democratic press has sneered at the PENDLETON bill or faintly praised it. In the Legislature of Ohio, Mr. PENDLETON'S own State, not only did the Democratic members of the House refuse to vote to commend Congress for passing the bill, but they put upon record a solemn protest against it; while in the Senate the Democrats refused to vote upon the resolution of commendation. In Massachusetts, General BUTLER, the Democratic Governor, ridiculed the subject in his Message, and at the Democratic feast where he was nominated for the Presidency by ex-Governor SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island, he put forth as his cry the phrase that the government belongs to its friends – a flat and meaningless paraphrase of MARCY'S crisp and trenchant defiance, to the victors belong the spoils.

In New York Democratic hostility is not less apparent. In the Senate, at the opening of the session, Mr. COVERT offered a resolution to the effect that the proper nominations of the Governor should be confirmed. But this was as suspicious as a man's vehement assertion that he means to tell the truth. If the Senators should refuse to confirm such nominations they ought to be impeached. They might differ as to what are proper nominations, but that is another point. As this resolution was said to be intended to express sympathy with reform, Mr. PITTS, a Republican Senator, offered an amendment explicitly declaring certain reform principles, and he used the language of Governor CLEVELAND in his Message. But Mr COVERT, in warmly opposing the amendment and denouncing the Republicans as Latter-day Saints, proclaimed his adhesion to the spoils doctrine, and his party friends, with two or three exceptions, voted against the amendment. The Democratic reluctance to approve the reform for which the party Conventions have been loudly declaring is due to the expectation of success in 1884. But with the genius for blundering and the singular incapacity for practical statesmanship which now seem to be inherent in the party, the Democrats are surely alienating the vote upon which their success depends. The only distinctive declaration that the Democratic party is making for the Presidential election is that of the spoils for the victor. It is as stupid a cry for 1884 as the cry of "the war is a failure" for 1864.

THE BASIS OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION

THE National Republican Committee has decided to retain the old basis of representation, and that the delegates shall be elected not less than thirty nor more than sixty days before the meeting of the Convention, and that the district delegates may be chosen either at local district conventions or by the district delegates in a State Convention. This decision changes the present situation only by preventing such performances as those of the New York and Pennsylvania conventions of 1880—which were held about four months before the assembling of the National Convention – and by the option of a local district convention.

The basis of representation is left as before, and exposes the nomination to the chance of decision by the "rotten boroughs." Mr LODGE asserted strenuously that there was a principle in basing the representation upon population, but no principle in basing it upon the vote. On the contrary, the only principle in the matter is with the latter proposition. The object of selecting delegates is to ascertain the preference of the party. To that end the delegate constituencies must be reasonably equalized. But to give a thousand Republican voters in one place the same representation with five thousand in another is not only to choose a false basis, but it is to subject the nomination to the chance of being decided against the wish of the majority of Republican voters. If, therefore, it be considered wise to give every Congressional district in the country a representation, nothing is plainer than that the increase of representation should be determined by Republican voters, and not by mere population.

But another result could hardly have been expected from a committee in which Territories and non-Republican States were largely represented. The distinct gain is that the absurdity of the unit rule is abolished. The Republican sentiment of every district will be heard and respected. This would have been still more assured by requiring the delegate election to be held in the districts. But the old tyranny yielded as little as possible. Meanwhile it is well to remember that Republican success depends, not upon the manner in which delegates are elected, important as that question is, but upon what the country believes to be the spirit and purpose of the Republican party. It is Congress, and not the National Committee, which can do most for Republican triumph in 1884.

PRESIDENTIAL INABILITY.

SENATOR INGALLS has introduced a bill providing a method of determining the inability of the President to discharge the duties of his office. The bill provides that whenever two heads of departments shall state in writing to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, if the court be not then sitting, the Chief Justice shall, within ten days, convene it to hear and determine summarily the question of the alleged inability, and if upon the hearing it shall appear to the court that inability exists, they shall certify their decision to the Vice-President, who shall thereupon discharge the powers and duties of the office of President. The second section makes a similar provision for determining the removal of the inability, and provides that, upon the ascertainment of such removal, the President shall resume the discharge of the powers and duties of his office.

This appears to be a simple and judicious settlement of a question which is full of mischievous possibilities, and which the Constitution left open. The Constitution says that "in case of the removal of the President from his office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President." That is all. No mention is made of Congress or of legislation. But in case of the inability both of the President and Vice-President, Congress is expressly authorized to declare what officer shall act as President. Senator LAPHAM, of New York, in discussing the Presidential succession bill asserted that the conclusion is irresistible that the Vice-President alone must decide when to assume the duties of the Presidency. The constitutional provision he declares to be self-executing, and requiring no legislation. The President, however, in his annual Message, hopes that Congress will settle the question, in order that no possible embarrassment may arise, and the action of the Senate in passing Senator HOAR'S bill prescribing the succession in the cabinet, and the prompt introduction of Senator INGALLS'S bill, show a satisfactory disposition to follow the recommendation of the President.

The view of Senator LAPHAM, if correct, would reveal a peril in the Vice Presidency which has not been hitherto suspected. The office has been regarded as an honorary superfluity, a fifth wheel, as an excess. But the argument of Mr. LAPHAM would introduce anarchy at any moment. To the pertinent question of Senator BLAIR, of New Hampshire, as to what would happen if the Vice-President should assert the inability of the President, and the President deny it, the only answer of Senator LAPHAM was that the President, being in possession, with the army and navy under his command, could probably maintain his right. Senator BLAIR properly replied that this was no answer. This is evident, because in this case supposed the army and the navy would be obliged to decide for themselves, as Mr. LAPHAM says the Vice-President must decide for himself, whether the inability exists. Half of the army might decide one way and half the other, and each would obey the commander in-chief that it believed to be such. A more anarchical view could not be offered. The want of due provision for ascertaining inability is, like the want of precise definition of the power of Congress in determining the electoral vote, an omission in the Constitution. It is not conceivable that the fundamental law intended to allow the Vice-President to assume the Presidency merely upon his own assertion of the inability of the President, and to hold it as long as he might choose to allege the continuation of the inability. Mr INGALLS'S proposition is a reasonable solution of the question, and, except that all such provisions allow infinite hair-splitting in debate, we should expect to see it promptly adopted, as it should be, with an amendment applying its procedure to the case of the Vice-President.

DANGERS IN HOTELS AND THEATRES.

CARE for human life does not keep pace with the astonishing progress of invention and with the advance of the conveniences of living. The elevator enables us to live in buildings enormously high, and with no more trouble in reaching the highest rooms than if they were all upon a level. But the elevator also furnishes a convenient and fatal passage for smoke and flame, and in a lofty house its increased advantage is thus at once set off by increased danger. Immense hotels capable of holding a thousand guests are the natural product of a country in which there is such incessant and enormous travel. Every device of convenience enables such a huge house to be thoroughly organized for the lodging, the eating, and the other accommodation of guests. But the means of escape from a building which holds a thousand persons are not greater, and by reason of the elevators are even less, than for buildings which hold only a hundred. Thus almost in the degree that hotels become vaster and more luxurious, and theatres more splendid, their safety diminishes, and stopping at a hotel and going to the theatre become serious perils.

This is another illustration of the inadequacy of the laissez faire and laissez-aller theory. This theory holds that private enterprise must not be interfered with, because the sense of public or common aid and protection leads to laziness and the decline of the progressive spirit. But this principle, although stoutly preached by a certain school as the sole secret of progressive human welfare, is constantly challenged by the experience of society. Society does not tolerate the laissez faire doctrine in the matter of making and selling gunpowder or other dangerous material. It does not allow ardent spirits to be sold at the free-will of the seller. It requires inspection of the safety of buildings and of the proper sanitary care of dwellings. In fact, society properly and necessarily interferes with individual action in a hundred ways, and for the good reason that mere self-interest is not found to be a sufficient protection to the community.

This principle of common interference in the interest of human life needs to be much more rigorously enforced. The fact that such a building as the Newhall House was tolerated in Milwaukee makes all the luxury and splendor of that city seem to be only gilded barbarism. The test of civilization and refinement is not electric lights, and elevators, and French cooking, and frescoed parlors, and Turkey carpets, but provision for the safety of human life. In the city of New York, for instance, there ought to be a strict and thorough scrutiny for this purpose of all hotels and lodging-houses by an authority competent to enforce necessary changes. Had there been such authority in Milwaukee, duly enforced, the frightful catastrophe of the Newhall House would not have disgraced the name of that city. If travellers who observe a want of proper means of safety in great hotels would "write to the papers," they would do a good public service. As it is, there is very great risk for every traveller who to put away in a remote corner, at the end of a narrow and intricate series of corridors, upon the fifth or sixth floor of an American hotel, with an elevator shaft ready to fill the house instantly with smoke and flame. It is not the builder or the host who is to blame, but the good natured public which does not choose to exercise its power to protect itself.

THE RE-ELECTION OF SENATOR HOAR.

It would have been a sorry tale to tell of Massachusetts that within three months she had elected General BUTLER Governor and defeated Mr. HOAR for the Senate. Fortunately this latter part of the story is not to be told. On the second day of the joint balloting the name of Mr. CRAPO was withdrawn, and apparently without authority from him, although he declared that he was not a candidate, and that his supporters were quite at liberty to vote for anybody else. Mr HOAR was at once elected Governor LONG, however, permitted his name to be used to the end.

The preference among the candidates was wholly personal. Neither Governor LONG nor Mr. CRAPO represented any principle or policy different from those represented by Mr. HOAR, and for that reason the Republicans who by refusing to support him gave to the Democrats the opportunity of electing the Senator took a great responsibility. Governor LONG is an excellent gentleman, and justly popular, but Governor LONG, elected Senator of Massachusetts by Democratic votes, would have sent Massachusetts Republicanism asunder. This rupture would have been the sole reason for Democratic support, and it was so obvious that it is surprising, when the Republican preference was so plainly declared, that Governor LONG'S name was not withdrawn. We repeat that if his name had represented any principle, as in 1851 that of CHARLES SUMNER represented as against ROBERT C. WINTHROP, the case would have been totally different.

We shall look with great interest to see in what way Mr HOAR does not represent the progressive Republicanism of Massachusetts, which is the charge against him. Meanwhile, if spotless character, eminent public ability and experience, the respect of his Senatorial associates, sturdy independence, unflinching courage, and strong convictions in general accord with the sentiment of his State, are proper qualifications, Massachusetts has in Mr. HOAR a most fitting Senator, the Republican party a representative of its best character and aims, and the country a wise and upright legislator.

AN OBVIOUS QUESTION.

A BILL has been passed by the New York Assembly authorizing the Committee on Charitable Institutions to investigate and report upon lunatic asylums. But why should a junketing coomission of persons who know nothing of the subject be appointed to do the proper work of the State Board of Charities, which is especially fitted by knowledge and experience to perform the duty required, and at no extra expense? A few years since a committee of the Senate, of which Mr WOODIN was chairman, investigated the lunatic institutions. It was an able committee, but it ascertained either too much or too little, for its report was of small value.

The State properly maintains a Board of Charities. It is composed of persons of the highest character, who devote their time and ability to the work. It is a body at once singularly efficient and modest, and its negative service in prevention, as well as its positive performance, is very great, but it is a quiet body of diligent workers, not of politicians, and its reports are not widely read. The State Board has a general supervision of all the charitable institutions which receive State aid. It is the authorized agent of the State, and it is entirely familiar with these institutions. If the Legislature requires specific information, why does it not ask it of its own agent? And upon whose report may the people of the State most confidently rely, that of a "champagne" commission of totally inexperienced legislators, or that of a peculiarly competent State Board of experts?

If it be supposed that the State Board may have some kind of connivance, understanding, or conspiracy with unwise or improper management in the institutions, so that its report would be suspicious, it would be a good reason for an inquiry toward removing the members. But no such accusation is made or could be justly made; and even if it could be suggested or sustained, why should not a Legislative committee be quite as open to suspicion? Indeed, experience has shown that nothing is more justly to be suspected on a mere pretense for "a lark" at the expense of the State than the appointment of what has come to be known as a smelling commission. If there be reason to suspect mismanagement in a particular institution, let the State Board be required at once to report the facts. If there be doubt of the wisdom or efficiency of the general system of management, let the State Board be asked to submit its views. If the results of the reports are unsatisfactory, the Legislature may itself investigate. But its disregard of the Board is in itself suspicious, and it tends to discredit one of the most important public bodies in the State, to which similar bodies in other States must naturally turn for information about public charities in New York, but to which they certainly will not turn if they see that the Board is virtually contemned by the action of the Legislature.

THE RESCUE OF NIAGARA.

AN association has been formed, with Mr. HOWARD POTTER as president, to secure legislative action for the preservation of Niagara Falls. This was the result of a meeting of a large number of gentlemen interested in the project, and whose character is the proof of the unmixed public purpose of the undertaking. Mr. JAMES T. GARDNER, Reporter of the State Survey, who, with Mr. FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED, has made a thorough investigation of the whole subject, stated at the meeting, in an interesting address, that within a short time Goat Island would be sold to settle the estate of the heirs, and on offers of many kinds and for many purposes have been already made, there must be no delay if the public value and the characteristic charm of the Falls are to be preserved. Mr. D. WILLIS JAMES, the chairman of the meeting, truly said that the destruction of the natural loveliness of the Falls must be regarded as a world-wide calamity.

When in 1878 the Governor-General of Canada proposed to Governor ROBINSON the movement for the means of the cataract, Governor ROBINSON, although always of the "old-fashioned" school of official economy, warmly approved the plan, and upon his suggestion of the subject to the Legislature it authorized the United States Survey Commissioners to report. The result of the inquiry was a bill providing for a State reservation of land around the Falls to preserve its scenery, which passed the Assembly of New York in 1880. But on Governor CORNELL announced his intension to veto it, it was not pressed in the Senate.

It is hoped and believed that Governor CLEVELAND is more friendly than his predecessor to a scheme which is in itself an excellent, which must be accomplished immediately if at all, and which it would be a disgrace to New York not to accomplish, when every circumstance shows that it could be carried out in its true spirit and without extravagance. The family of the late General PORTER, which has been long the owner of Goat Island, has begun its annually intact. But its ownership must now change, and the question for the Legislature is whether the State shall preserve unimpaired the sublimity of a natural spectacle within its domain which is unparalleled in the world, or whether the grandeur and beauty of Niagara shall be obliterated by unsightly buildings and the smoke of factories, by drinking saloons and dance halls and curiosity shops, as indelible stain upon the great name and an endless reproach to the public spirit of New York. Those who are interested in the good work can procure petitions for signatures from Rev. J. H. HARRISON, Franklin Falls, New Hampshire.

PERSONAL.

IN a very appreciative notice of Mr MONCURE D CONWAY'S Travels in South Kensington, published by HARPER & BROTHERS, the London Times says that they "are more extensive than the title would imply. For he not only takes us on a walk through the Museum, indicating its most remarkable features with the quick appreciation of a master, but he invites us to accompany him into some of the private dwellings in London, which have either been decorated as a labor of love by the prosperous artists who inhabit them, or enriched by the millionaires who are discriminating patrons of the arts . . . As regards the advances of decorative art Mr Conway shows that few people have any conception of them. . . . You may pass the threshold of many cabinet-looking mansion in wet streets or squares to lose yourself in the admiration of a fairy-like museum of the arts of all ages and countries."

—Many of our readers will remember with pleasure the concerts given in this country several years ago by the VESALIUS sisters. Since then these young ladies have made a very successful tour through the English colonies in South Africa, singing chiefly in Pinafore, Patience, and other light operas. One of the sisters, Miss LOUISE VESALIUS, has been engaged to play a leading part at the Strand Theatre, London.

—Mr WINSLOW HOMER, the well-known genre painter, does not care to paint girls under fourteen years old. His favorite age for them is not the poetic sixteen, but nineteen. Mr HOMER will make a notable display at the forth coming Water-color Exhibition.

—Mr. ELIHU VEDDER has the good fortune to be appreciated alike by the National Academy of Design and the Society of American Artists. He thinks that in the model republic of the future an artist will have money enough to paint as he likes, and will hang his pictures in a public gallery where the people can see them without charge.

—Mr. THOMAS W CHELSEA'S country residence at Bryn Mawr, near Philadelphia, is a perfect example of a Queen Anne villa. It is built of red brick on a knoll in the midst of a far-reaching, rolling landscape, and furnished throughout in the interests of truest comfort.

—A part of the library and some of the pictures of the late Dr JOHN BROWN, author of Rab and his Friends, will be sold by auction in Edinburgh near the end of January.

—In OTTO JAHN'S new Life of Mozart that celebrated composer appears not only as a true artist, but also as a well-nigh faultless husband, son, and friend.

—Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON, according to the Saturday Review, is not merely the titular head of English art, but "by common consent, perhaps, the most universally accomplished of English artists."

—General WOLSELEY has been telling some school-children how to succeed in life. "We should all begin life with a determination to do well whatever we take in hand; and if that determination be adhered to with the pluck for which Englishmen are renowned success, according to the nature and quality of our brain power, is, I think, a certainty. Had I begun life as a tinker, my earnest endeavor would have been to make better pots and pans than my neighbors, and I think I may venture to say without any vanity that with God's blessing I should have been fairly successful."

—To reclaim the depopulation of the Scottish Highlands the Duke of Argyll wishes to see the district cut up into farms of all sizes, including the smallest capable of supporting a man and his family.

—Says the Hour: "On Monday last the flags at half-mast on some of the well-known club houses of this city conveyed to the members the sad news of the almost sudden death of their associate Mr WILLIAM A SLATER. This genial gentleman and good companion will be missed and mourned on both sides of the Atlantic. WILKIE COLLINS, EDMUND YATES, HENRY BYRON, and a host of literary men will join WILLIAM M EVARTS, Judge BARRY, and scores of others eminent on the bench, at the bar, in the pulpit, as well as in the journalistic profession here, in doing honor to his memory. Who that dined with him last week, and listened to the jolly raconteur, could have imagined him to have been sixty-nine years old. But for his gray hairs, he seemed rather to be thirty-nine. His friends were legion. Bishops, editors, actors, lawyers, litterateurs, and judges will join in a common and sincere lament that 'a fellow of infinite jest' has gone over to the silent majority."

—THOMAS HUGHES thinks that the great majority of moderate Churchmen care very little how the question of "mixed chalice, lighted candles, and vestments" is ultimately settled.

—A foreign reviewer is particularly pleased with HAWTHORNE'S naïve remark, in Doctor Grimshawe's Secret, that "deceased people are matters from no erroneous, or no least too exclusive, point of view." He declares that it has "all the genius of Rawmonsen in it."

—Mr E. A. ABBEY, says the London Spectator, "is so enamored of HARRICK that he has taken the utmost pains to reproduce Devonshire scenery and rural life by studying it, and has made himself master of the STUART period. His labor has been rewarded with a signal success. It may be questioned if there is any living English artist who could have given such sketches, at once faithful and beautiful."

—The Philadelphia Ledger of the 16th inst. pays a feeling tribute to the character and ability of its late financial editor, Mr. JOSEPH SAILER, who for more than forty-two years conducted the money-market department of that paper. He was a man of distinguished capacity, and was highly esteemed by the financial authorities of the country.

—The greatest living writers for the French stage, EMILE AUGIER, SARDOU, and DUMAS, have, says the Academy, already done the greater part of their work. SARDOU, the youngest of them, is a fully middle-aged man, and there is not one of the three whose literary position is better to-day than it was ten years ago. And who is to succeed these three to-morrow? Where are the young French dramatists of serious talent—the men with the capacity for work?

—Professor EDWARD DOWDEN is sorry that in Professor JOHN NICHOL'S American Literature some writers are dismissed in haste. "I could wish," he writes, "to hear more of THOMAS RILEY than that he is a 'newspaper reviewer of distinction'; and in the chapter on Politics and Oratory to find at least the name of REUFUS CHOATE, and in the chapter on Poets to learn why the distinction of appearing first among American authors in a monumental status fell to FITZ-GREENE HALLECK, and in that on Transcendentalism to have the secret of the extraordinary influence of MARGARET FULLER, and of the veneration with which many regard Mr ALCOTT, revealed somewhat more fully."

—The Miss Lydia Languish of the last century (observes a recent writer) found it necessary when a visitor was announced to hide her novels. "Ring Perceyene Pickle under the toilet," she bids her maid; "throw Roderick Random into the closet; put The Man of Feeling into your pocket; now lay Mrs Chapone in sight, and leave Fordyce's Sermons open on the table." But the Miss Lydia Languish of the present day is not so skittish about her novel-reading at the advent of a maiden aunt or an elderly gentleman.

—A philosopher remarks that if, as soon as a man of distinction is dead, his literary heirs are allowed to publish every anecdote he knows, however depreciating, at his surviving contemporaries, a fresh terror will be added to human intercourse.

—Mr SAM WARD, of this city, declares that his nephew, Mr. CRAWFORD, wrote the novel Mr Isaacs in less than a month.

—The Critic thinks that many professional performances might be put to shame by the amateur theatricals given a few days ago at the Madison Square Theatre. The play was A Russian Honeymoon, by Mrs. BURTON N HARRISON. It is the story of The Taming of the Shrew, and "nothing is prettier than to see the fine womanly nature of the heroine beating down her pride, and in which her heart softening to her husband, until she tears up her demand for a divorce, and would rather starve his poverty than let him go." Mrs J. B. FORTER played the heroine, and Mrs. W. S. ANDREWS the Baroness. Mr G F HOPLAND, Jun., Mr A T MASON, Mr W S ANDREWS, and Mrs. FRANK H. WHITE were also on the cast.

—The late Bishop SAMUEL WILBERFORCE wrote in his diary in 1868: "I have very much enjoyed meeting GLADSTONE. He is so delightfully true and the same, just as full of interest in every good thing of every kind, and so exactly the opposite of the mystery man! He is now sitting opposite to me in the railway carriage, on his way to Windsor Castle."

—Appended notice in the London Era: "Died.—KATE, the beloved wife of Professor VAN HAM, formerly a famous equestrienne, after a long but painless illness, took her last and final leap, without fear or excitement, on the 21st ultimo, we hope to a better world, where envy and ambition are unknown. Interred (27th) at the Brompton Cemetery."

—The London Times, in a notice of HARPER'S CHRISTMAS, pays a high tribute to the genius of Mr ABBEY, Mr. REINHART, and the other artists whose work appears in that publication, as well as to the skill of the engravers. Of the latter it says: "The workmanship is really beyond praise. The labor expended in producing these prints is amazing. Such is the delicacy of the work that it hointes the lowdest and subtle shades of w chalk drawing, and seems at times almost to reach the power of color . . . No English illustrated paper has, so far as we know, produced engravings of such remarkable excellence as are to be found here."

—In his very interesting autobiography, just finished in the Revue des Deux Mondes, M RENAN assures the public that he has not told in his book the year 1851. Before that time "I lied often enough," but not from unworthy motives, his desire having been simply to present things in their most agreeable aspect. The few "social white lies" that he has told in later days were only those particularly rare "qui sont les caresses permettues."

—Mr BLOOMFIELD MOORE'S house in Philadelphia contains an art gallery in which the chief attractions are a still life by ROSALBA BARRETT BROWNING, and a life-size marble statue of Mrs. Moore's daughter, the Countess RAUSI, of Sweden. The still life, presented by the artist's father, ROSALBA BROWNING, depicts a shell, a metallic pitcher, a Japanese fan, and some studs and books on a rug on a table, the whole treated with considerable pictorial aptitude. The statue shows the countess sitting in a chair of state, and displaying with fine effect the unusual beauty of her hands. The back of the chair is an intricate piece of carving. It represents Cupid watching two birds who pay court to each other on the edge of their nest. Mrs. MOORE is at present residing in Europe.

SKETCHES ON THE DANUBE.

THE outlet of the famous defile of Kazan, through which the Danube rushes with tremendous velocity, is marked by the inscription which was carved on the solid rock by command of the Emperor TRAJAN, seventeen centuries ago. Along the rocky face of the defile are still visible the sockets drilled by his soldiers to receive the supports for the wooden bridge by which they made their passage down the river. Other remains of Roman work may be seen at various points along this section of the Danube; but the tablet, by reason of its perfect condition, attracts more attention than any other token of ancient Roman occupation.

The artist to whose pencil our readers are indebted for the above sketches writes that when he and his travelling companion, a learned professor and geologist, reached this interesting spot, a miserable fisherman was found cooking his dinner over a fire built directly under the venerable inscription. The smoke was blacking the still clearly defined letters and figures, and the professor's wrath was roused to such a pitch by the desecration that he immediately assaulted the offender with umbrella and geological hammer, and kicked his dinner off the ledge into the rushing current.

The artist's diagram will give an idea of the inexplicable manner in which the strata of rocks forming the celebrated "Iron Gate" of the Danube are cut up and intermingled. The most wonderful of all is the regular stratum of rock, about twenty-five feet in thickness, which runs in a nearly horizontal direction through these wildly confused masses.

The artist and his companion had a most disagreeable experience of the reckless manner in which Servian drivers urge their teams down the steep roads. Remonstrance was useless, and the travellers were bounced and jolted about in the most uncomfortable manner in the springless, hard-seated wagon.

CONGER FISHING OFF THE COAST OF CORNWALL.

IN the early history of England, congers, the catching of them, their preparation and exportation, seem to have played an important part. In King John's time there was an established trade in the curing of congers, and to certain merchants of Bayonne was accorded the privilege of catching and drying congers in England.

and the sending of them to Spain and Portugal. As there really is nothing absolutely new in the world, it looks as if the method of preparing the conger approached quite closely to our "desiccated fish." The congers were dried, powdered, and what the old commercial shermanders called conger dust, or conger douse, was made. In time, however, the fish-eaters of Spain and Portugal seem to have tired of their conger; the trade in this special fish declined, and finally disappeared, to be replaced by the cod. The discovery of the great fishing banks off the Newfoundland coast revolutionized the fish food of the world, and though the conger is still sought after in Norwegian waters, it enters but in a limited way into general consumption.

In America where the conger has a wide geographical range, and a species has been lately described by Gosse and Bean, the Conger oceanicus, coming from Pensacola, Florida. The American conger differs [illegible] very much [illegible] else from the English fish. Mr. E. G. Blackford, the Fish Commissioner of the State of New York, states that congers taken occasionally by the cod fishermen are rarely above eight pounds in weight, while those fish have been taken in England of ninety pounds. This difference of size seems due to temperature, as in Northern Europe the congers are larger where the seas are colder, diminishing in size in warmer waters, the congers of the Mediterranean being the smallest.

Conger-fishing off the coast of Cornwall is still prosecuted both for business and sport. There seem to be certain localities where congers are the most abundant, and their peculiar haunts are in proximity to those bold rocks which stud the deep water along the Cornish coast. It is believed that the fish are quite sensitive to the effects of cold, becoming torpid in severe weather, and in some cases very low temperatures apparently kill them. Fishermen assert that congers are sensible of any change of wind and weather, coming up then from the deeper water and ranging nearer the shore. Variations in the color of congers appear to be due to that wonderful power many creatures possess of adapting themselves to their surroundings. About thirty miles from the Cornish coast

A HEAVY PULL.

A GOOD CATCH.

there is a reef, rising almost to the surface of the sea, where good conger fishing is found. The tops of the ledge is of dark-colored rock, while the sides where it slopes to the deeper sea are of a lighter shade. Congers caught on the black rock are of the same color, while those close to the deeper gullies are almost white.

The conger feeds at night, and fishing is always carried on after dark. A moonlight night interferes with conger-fishing. At times the fish seem to be particularly voracious, seizing with avidity almost any kind of live bait. The capacity of a conger to swallowing a large fish is very great, and a tenpound lobster has been found in its stomach. Like all fish, the power of digestion is very rapid, and Cuvier in his History of Knyfish Fishes states, "when a hook is swallowed it becomes acted on and consumed in a very short time."

The favorite bait of the conger fisherman is the squid, or cuttle-fish, and the fresher they are the more likely are they to afford good sport. Some acquaintance with the nature of the cuttle fish is necessary, for otherwise, while the fisherman is in the act of putting it all squirming on the hook, it may eject its inky black fluid all over him. A dark night being selected, then, three fishermen take a small row boat and skirt the coast. While one pulls at the oars, the others prepare the tackle. A good strong line capable of standing a heavy pull is a necessity, and hooks must be tied on in the most approved manner, as the conger is supplied with sharp cutting teeth, which he can use by the movement of his head in a rotary manner. The other accessories in the conger hunt are few—a heavy gaff, a sharp knife, and a lantern.

A good spot having been selected—and wonderful is the knowledge the fishermen of [illegible] possess of [illegible] which are going out at [illegible] the [illegible] with the line arranged, and it is dropped into the water with a lively squat. Sometimes the conger is slow at biting, and [illegible] with the hook. At last a good strong tug is felt, and the fish is struck and hauling in commences. This is by no means an easy job. Being nothing short than a huge eel, the conger has all the tricks of that fish, which neglect dead or much. As soon as the conger feels the restraint of the line he begins revolving and with sufficient force to sometimes disengage himself from the hook. The fisherman, on his guard, keeps a taut line on the fish, gradually hauling him to the surface. The boat hauls over with the heavy strain, for a stout-jawed fish is no light weight to haul on to. Alongside of the man with the line is his mate, ready to strike the fish with a gaff. Just as soon as the head of the conger appears above the water, the gaff is driven into the neck, and in this way the fish is hauled on board.

A [illegible] conger is by no means a pleasant companion. Armed with [illegible] powerful blows with [illegible] mouth. Just now [illegible] of conger [illegible] when the fisherman has struck his first [illegible] the [illegible] bit off his left [illegible] As soon as the conger is well on board a sharp [illegible] the fish just [illegible] the head and the fish dies [illegible] In splendid being secured. In [illegible] if a fish would be killed [illegible] allowed to die a lingering death.

In former years conger fishing was more successful than at present. Fleets [illegible] sometimes [illegible] the taking of three pounds of congers [illegible] a week [illegible] is not half so much as it was. Still a great many [illegible] and [illegible] in front of the coast, fishing of nights in order to get the conger. There is [illegible] of danger [illegible] the [illegible] there is always a certain [illegible] and a large [illegible] fish as the conger [illegible] in the open sea, in the [illegible] the conger [illegible] when [illegible] the hours pass [illegible]

APPROACHING THE TRUTH

CHAPTER V.

BECOMING FRIENDS.

The superficial observer—that very indefinite character which no one in particular cares to acknowledge—would have surmised at this period that there was a happy family at Farm Forlorn. Here at least, he would have thought, had assembled those whom past doubts and dislikes had not sparr for a while, and who under the hospitable roof of John Woodhatch, and influenced by his kindness, had shaken hands, and set the bygones forever aside. Here was the new life hitting to the new times—a brand-new era of perfect confidence, a fair landscape stretching out in the present, a fairer prospect for the future, and the sun coming up over the great grey hills which yesterday had been like eternal barriers in the paths of these folk now sitting side by side with smiles upon their lips. The superficial observer would have gone on his way marvelling at the fickleness of Farm Forlorn, and noting over a sign of the great upheaval to come, of the elements fleeting forces armed to the teeth marching silently on guard to do battle in these calm green fields, and wreck the peace of years.

Yes, this was the calm before the storm, not perfect peace, as Woodhatch, the dreamer, thought it was. Miss Brake was quiet and grave, with her past parchment no longer evident, a recdel visitor whom nothing disturbed, and who apologized for the trouble that she was to everybody, and seemed to regard even Mrs. Chadderton as a humble friend whom she might presently love very much. She sat in her big arm-chair, and smiled, if a little sadly, at all visitors, saying but few words, and catching every one with an interest that was remarkably flattering. If there were one person more than another to whom she showed an extra amount of respect now, it was the Reverend Alexander Larcom, making amends thereby, as it seemed, and as it really was, for her ungenerous suspicions of him.

I have been in the wrong; I am a woman very often in the wrong," she confessed on the first occasion of addressing him under John Woodhatch's roof, "but you are a Christian minister, and will forgive the hard thoughts I have had—the hard words I sent to you by my brother's widow."

"Ye sent them in an hevry either, Hester Brake," he said dryly, and with his sharpy eyebrow lowering a little over his deep set eyes, "and ye had five verses to pick and choose them."

"Yes, I know," she answered. "But the story seemed to fit in with my doubts—it seemed so probable you should kill him."

"I am obleeged to ye for the notion."

"You had discovered Morris and Lucy together, the thought of their secret marriage might not have occurred to me—you saw a woman deceived and an honest home dishonored, and you struck him down in a mad fury. That is how it seemed to me. Forgive me, old friend, of whom I should have had more charitable thoughts," she cried, "remembering your past kindness to me."

"And ye have changed your mind about me now?"

"Yes, completely," she said. "Am I forgiven?"

"Wa'al, yes," he replied "why not? Ye were always a poor, flighty thing, I'm fancying, darting like a lapwing to conclusions, and I was not much deestirbed by your suspicions. 'She'll think somebody else killed Morrie presently,' I said, 'and she'll forget her doubts o' me.' And so it is?"

"Yes So it is"

"And if ye'll take a sensible friend's advice, Hester," he said, "ye'll not bother any more about the matter. It's kept you down too long—it's made ye ill too after."

"It has killed me, Mr Larcom."

"Ye were very fond of that brother n' yours, though I did not see much in him myself but a fly-away sarte like your own," said the parson, "and ye spoiled him"

"I loved him for his good qualities—I knew he would grow out of the bad, and if time was not denied him," she said, with a sigh, "and he—"

"Ye—es, presently" And then Alexander Larcom walked away from the maiden lady, tired of that one subject, or extremely unwilling to avoid it. Still he was glad in his heart that she had professed her regret for doubting him, he hated people doubting him, his mission being, as he thought, to gather love and confidence around him, to preach and pray and do his best for poor humanity. To have been, even in this weak woman's mind, an object of distrust had wounded his self respect—and clashed with the very good opinion he had always had of himself, for that matter. Still Hester Brake was a poor, eccentric creature, and she had been as sorely tried as his own daughter Lucy

And Lucy Brake, she had been a fortnight now at Farm Forlorn, and was one of the new and happy family. She had surely benefited by the change from the little cottage in the high road to the spacious rooms of the big old farm-house—to the great garden and the broad meadows lying beyond. The association had been painful rather than pleasurable to begin with, but this she was prepared for, and, after all, her happiest times had been within these walls; here she had learned to love Morris, and Morris to love her, here had been wild impulsive romance, leaping forward blindly and without much regard to consequences, but still a romance, pure and ardent and full of the deep love of life—a girl and boy's love, perhaps, but, whilst it lasted, like an other happiness on God's earth. It was all ended, but there were sweet thoughts amongst the ruins, fair flowers amongst the tares, and after a while the shadows did not fall so darkly across her path, and even to think of Morris became a peaceful retrospect.

Then again here was life for Lucy Brake, we have said, and a new affection growing very rapidly and remarkably, she thought herself, for Kitty Vanch. That she could hardly understand, but there it was, and she did not attempt to resist it, or to reason with it, or to account for it. She was romantic still, poor Lucy, and thought it remarkable and fateful in its way, when it was simply a very commonplace proceeding, the natural outcome of a loving nature, the instinct for affection in some shape or way, the craving to be loved, which every woman has, and a few men, perhaps, with hearts upon their sleeves.

It was strange that those two young women should approach each other, the elder one knowing little of life, and the younger a scarred warrior after life's battles with poverty and crime, but both women in earnest, who had known great trouble and had had few friends, and both grateful for affection, and in themselves affectionate. Lucy Brake could not account for it, we have said, but it was flattering to know that Kitty Vanch began to look up to her, to regard her as a friend above her in position, character, mental capacity, and to show by various little ways that the one proud to be noticed. There was certainly a strange and deep interest in her evinced by Kitty Vanch, as if some hidden motive were at the bottom of it, drawing Kitty toward her, almost at times, Lucy could imagine—being highly imaginative—against her will, against even the wishes of others, she was inclined to fancy sometimes. And to return for this Lucy Brake found it easy to love Kitty Vanch. There was something original about the girl, she was so frank and open and fearless, her dark eyes looked so earnestly, sometimes so sadly, to her, and in all his life Lucy had received such little sympathy, the thought—village beauty, and something more than a village beauty, though she was. Lucy had never become in any way attached to a female friend of her own age—Mr Larcom had not encouraged female friendships at any time, it may be said—and Kitty's life, away from Bailey's Rents, had been spent with an eccentric, fretful, if warm-hearted invalid. Hence after a while, and without taking the Lucas into consideration, these two young women soon drew together, and even little Morice became a link between them despite Lucy's experiencing at times a jealous pang when Kitty's brightness was too many smiles from her daughter.

Add to all this Lucy's knowledge that Greg Dorward was to be Kitty's husband, and that Greg Dorward had spoken only a few weeks back of his deep love for herself, and one need not be surprised at Lucy Brake's interest in her new friend Lucy was sometimes perplexed, and hardly able to reconcile Gregory Dorward's present manner with that of their last meeting on the high-road and his words of him and passion. At times she wished she had not promised to keep his secret, it was so like treachery to the unsuspecting Kitty, who was deserving of a true affection, and not a make-believe love to oblige John Woodhatch, farmer And whether Greg Dorward would make Kitty a good husband was even a matter of grave doubts to her, Greg being clever and ambitious, and surely not loving Kate Vanch very deeply yet—trying to lose her even, to her had confessed to Lucy, and as a mere matter of obedience to the patron who had insisted on the match.

Still Kate Vanch was happy, and Greg Dorward was content. Perhaps Greg had only fancied he was in love with her, thought Lucy, very humbly, and while Kate Vanch was away from him. He was only polite to her now, as became him, as very much on guard, and he seemed to encourage rather than to dislike the growing friendship between her and his fiancée.

"I am very pleased to see you ten together, Mrs. Brake," Greg had said on one occasion "You and she true friends, may be some day of service to each other."

"I don't see how that can be," said Lucy, inquiringly.

"Oh! And I can not explain," he replied; "but sometimes I think you may Life changes rapidly, and you two have been all my life, to it were."

"But—"

"You in the past," he said, in a low voice—"the past that is dead—and she in the present, which means for her and me. Do you understand?"

"Hardly," she replied, "but the past is dead?"

"Yes," he responded.

"And you love Kitty Vanch truly, and as she deserves to be loved?"

"Is she not going to be my wife?" he rejoined.

"That is not an answer"

"Yes, then, I love Kitty; but it is a very different kind of—"

"Spare me," said Lucy, quickly. "I know what you are going to say, and it must be left unsaid for all our sakes; for Kitty's, most of all."

"I can trust you"

"With your past secret," she answered. "Do not trouble me with any new ones, for I will not promise to keep them"

"I am silent," answered Greg.

"And women can not keep a secret."

"I do not believe that," said Greg; "I would trust a woman rather than a man in a great affliction."

"You would trust John Woodhatch?"

Greg Dorward shuddered strangely, and Lucy Brake remarked this.

"There are troubles which no man could share with Mr Woodhatch," Greg answered, moodily; "he could never understand them. Some women might, I fancy."

"You talk as if you had all the troubles of the world upon your shoulders, Greg," said Lucy, "instead of the world opening out before you bright with color"

"I am in a moody fit to-night," he said, with a forced laugh, "I feel as if something were going to happen to me"

"Here w Kitty to cheer you," she said, as Kate came into the room, looked toward them, and advanced in their direction

"We were talking of you, Kate," said Lucy, to the approached.

"Hint's right. I should be jealous, I dare say, if you talked only of your two selves," she answered, frankly.

"Jealous of me?" asked the young widow, a little later on, and in allusion to Kitty's last remark, "never of me, I hope, that is not likely."

"Likely that you should love my Greg," said Kitty, laughing. "Well, I can not imagine that happening."

"No," replied Lucy Brake; "it is impossible."

CHAPTER VI.

JEALOUS.

Thean were two inmates of Farm Forlorn, very probably there, who did not regard the growing friendship between Lucy Brake and Kitty with any great amount of favor. Hester Brake hardly seemed to care for it, although apathetic and generally amiable; and John Woodhatch felt that his calculations for the future were a little disturbed by this unlooked for incident. He had not thought of the result of bringing these two young women together, or of a sisterly love springing up between them, these characters were dissimilar, their lives were likely to be always apart, and he had not given a thought to them as friends. He had wished to interest Lucy in Hester Brake, and Hester in Lucy, he had planned and plotted to bring them together, and with a kindly forethought as to the time when Kitty should be married, and the wherever, left alone, requiring some earnest, kindly companion at her side in Kitty's place. Who more fitting than the sister-in-law from whom Hester Brake had held aloof till now, and had indeed never seemed to like?

"I feel it not been for her, Morrie would be alive," Hester Brake had said two years ago to John Woodhatch; and now that the invalid lady was inclined to regard Lucy with less asperity, to judge her character more truly, to remember she was Morris's widow, and still mourning for him, it was a little vexatious to find that Lucy preferred Kitty's company, and though respecting Hester now, made but very little advance toward an intimate acquaintance with her.

"It will come in time," soliloquized John Woodhatch, philosophically; "when Kate is married, and those two are drawn together more"

The marriage day was fixed at last. Four weeks hence from the time of which we speak it had been appointed by John Woodhatch, and neither Greg nor Kitty had a word to say against it

"The farm at Bleathorpe will be quite ready by that time, Greg," said John Woodhatch, "meanwhile I have put an old friend in to mind it for you."

"An old friend?" repeated Greg, wonderingly

"Yes, Reuben Fludge," said Woodhatch, "who has turned over a new leaf, at least he says so, and I am disposed to believe him."

"You trust him again, sir," said Greg, "and after all?"

"Yes."

"That is singular"

"What is singular?" was the sharp inquiry

"That you should. I understood—I have heard—I did not think," stammered Greg Dorward, "that you could ever put faith again in man or woman who had once deceived you."

"Who told you so?"

"I can not remember; yourself, I think"

Mr Woodhatch frowned a little Possibly he had done so, in the old days, in order to keep Greg Dorward up to the mark, and thinking his creed was true enough at that time, but it did not please him now to be reminded of it. Had not that rule of his—if it had been his, he added, with a reserve—led on by a strange chain of events to the death of Morris Brake? Who should say that it had not?

"Faith is a strong word, Greg," he answered at last, "and, at all events, try and remember that I have learned to forgive—to believe in man's repentance."

He walked away after this; he seemed afraid of more questions from Greg Dorward. Presently Greg rode out on horseback, and went at a tolerably swift pace to Bleathorpe, to see Fludge for himself, probably to congratulate him on being once more re-instated in the favor of John Woodhatch; more probably still to ask a few questions of that young gentleman, Greg being of a curious turn of mind, and conscious that all was not so fair sailing at Farm Forlorn as the calm aspect of surrounding things and the serenity of the master might seem to warrant at first sight.

Lucy Brake, from the garden of Farm Forlorn, had seen Greg ride away, bidding farewell to Kitty before he mounted his horse, and Hester Brake had stood at the open window of the farm parlor, also watching them with interest. When they had departed, the invalid came slowly into the sunshine, and separated, as it were, Kitty and Lucy, by intrusting Kitty with her keys, and giving her some lengthy instructions as to the arrangement of her wardrobe

Lucy Brake suspected there was a reason for this, and was not surprised when Hester said, presently,

"I have sent Kitty away, because I have something to say to you this morning which I don't want any one else to hear."

"Is it so very important?" asked Lucy

"I think it is. Let little Morice leave us, please; the child fidgets me this morning."

Lucy regarded the fretful woman dubiously. Was the nearness of the meeting on the sands to be repeated? Were hard words and mo suspicions to be the order of the day? For who could tell what strange topics Hester Brake might broach, having had so much time to brood on the mysteries about her, and being a mystery in herself?

"You need not be afraid of me," said Hester, accurately reading the impression on the fair face confronting hers. "I want to speak to you for a little while concerning Kitty. That is why I sent her away"

Lucy let little Morice trip off after this, and Hester Brake put her arm within that of her sister in law

"I am restless to-day, ill, perhaps. Let us walk up and down the lawn for a while, until I am tired, or," she added, "you are tired of me."

"Will this not overfatigue you?"

"You are very kind to be thus considerate," said the elder woman, with a spice of her old acerbity, "but I can bear more fatigue than you imagine And now to business."

This did not sound like a pleasant beginning, but Lucy was patient, and deferential to her senior. She did not believe it was in Miss Brake's power to disturb her equanimity now, the imagined she had learned to know Miss Brake a little better, and so make more allowance for her eccentricities. And certainly Miss Brake was eccentric, and with an awkward habit of taking people unawares.

"You will not be astonished to learn I am a jealous woman," Hester Brake commenced. "I acknowledge that myself; and I am jealous of Kitty's growing affection for you."

"Oh, Miss Brake, I hope not! You are surely not so childish as that"

"I think I am Pity me, if you think it childish; but I can not help it, being weak and vain, as you are, Lucy—as we women all are, for that matter," she said. "You see I am not speaking merely on dictatorially, only in all confidence—entirely confidence, if you will allow me to say as much"

"Am I doing harm to being one more friend to Kitty Vanch?"

"Is the friend to her after I am gone, Lucy, and when she will need one most," was the reply; "are I before."

"I can not treat her coldly."

"I do not ask you"

"I am interested in her—drawn toward her by her interest in me. Do you think that wrong?" asked Lucy.

"My dear, sometimes I think I don't know right from wrong," said Hester "The whirl of the world confuses me; and, God help me! I have much to think about"

"I am sorry for that—sorry to think you allow your mind to be disturbed by little matters which other folk would set aside or smile away."

"As in this instance, you mean?"

"Yes, in this instance," answered Lucy Brake. "It is not a little matter," said Hester "For five years (have had Kitty Vanch under my care—for more than five years, I may say I have been interested in her progress. I have, after my own fashion, helped to train her, brought her, as it were, from darkness into day, and you must not step between us As I have intimated before, you must wait until I am dead."

"You speak as if I were a rival or an enemy," Lucy replied, "as if I could not love her with yourself, and share her love with you. And you forget"

"What do I forget?"

"That she is engaged to Greg Dorward."

"I is to think of little else save that. That is a worse trouble than the thought of her liking you better than me," said Hester

"Ah! Miss Hester, I think such troubles as these might be easily set aside if you would only try," said Lucy, very gently.

"Shall I tell you something more?" asked Miss Brake, quickly, in reply

Lucy could scarcely repress a shudder. She was afraid of her sister-in law's confidences, and what might follow them.

"If it is necessary—if you think it is necessary," she added.

Hester Brake looked round cautiously, to if afraid of listeners, or suspicious that Mrs. Chadderton might, after a fashion of hers, be lurking in the background, and then said, in a low voice,

"Kitty Vanch will never marry Gregory Dorward."

CHAPTER VII.

A PROMISE.

Lucy Brake was astonished, but credulous. She had begun to regard Morris's sister as scarcely a wise woman; rather a woman who had strange fancies, and was remarkably suspicious, and never twice the same Was it possible that she was sane—quite sane, that Lucy Might not the past affliction which had nearly crushed herself, allied to the natural weakness of this fragile being's constitution, have wrecked her more completely? If Hester Brake were really mad, and had up to this time and with a madwoman's cunning carefully disguised it, what was to be done?

"Not marry Greg?" Lucy repeated

"I would rather see her in her coffin; it would be better sin should be there than in his arms," exclaimed Hester, passionately.

"Why should you think this?" asked Lucy.

"Pray, compose yourself"

"I am not raving, Lucy," was the answer, "and do not need to be composed"

How quickly Hester Brake read people's sus-pictures of her! was Lucy's next thought, before she said:

"You naturally surprised me. Why will not Kitty marry Greg?"

"Why?" repeated Miss Brake, like a woman anxious to gain time before she answered.

"Yes," said Lucy again, "why?"

"Because—he does not love her," she added.

"What makes you think so?"

"Because he loves you."

Lucy took a deep, long breath. Yes, an acute woman indeed, or will at a suspicious one, this Hester Brake. How could she have guessed a secret which she had promised Greg to keep for him, which Lucy had thought only Greg and herself could possibly have known?

"I have seen this very clearly. I have watched her every look since you came here."

Lucy did not reply.

"You do not deny this, Lucy?" continued Hester Brake, after a moment's silence. "Where is the virtuous indignation which should follow such a charge or name?"

"You do not charge me with loving him?"

"Do you?" echoed Hester.

"No. God forbid!"

"God be thanked," corrected Hester Brake, "for I do not like this man. I am afraid of him—I do not in my way believe in him."

"He is honest and straightforward and energetic—he will make Kitty a good husband—he—"

"Have I not said he will never marry Kate Vanch?" cried Hester Brake, sharply. "Do you think I have no will of my own, no power to stop it, no power to make you assist me to stop it? I tell you that I have!"

"Whether you have or not," said Lucy, in the calm clear tones which, despite of Hester's vehemence, seemed to exercise some influence on her listener, "you will have to consider whether it is a wise step to part them."

"He does not care for her."

"I am not sure of that."

"And finding it out afterward—oh! the terrible afterward to us women—would be no kill her, possibly. You must warn her, Lucy, and let her act for herself."

"No, no!" cried Lucy, quickly. "I will not do that. Greg does not love me; there was a foolish, fleeting fancy once, and that was all. I will not be the one to disturb a woman's confidence in her lover."

"You would prefer her being deceived."

"I believe it would be as well," said Lucy, thoughtfully.

"You are romantic still, poor child," replied her sister-in-law; "but you are terribly selfish, for all that. You thrust a task upon myself that is beyond my strength to bear."

"You would never act so cruelly."

"So mercifully would be a better word," said Miss Brake, taking her hand from Lucy's arm, withdrawing it even in anger from her, "for this will be a mercy."

She walked slowly toward the house, with Lucy keeping step by her side, not liking to leave her in her present mood, and with that look of set determination on her face. It presaged too much. It might mean more trouble than any one could foresee, that miserable and envious woman could imagine, thought Lucy, indignantly agon.

"You will do nothing in haste, Hester," she said—"if I may call you Hester now. It is an easy to do harm, so hard to stay its effects when done."

"I know it without your preaching—which you might leave to your father. It's his business," Hester answered. "I am aware I am not an amiable woman who can soften a blow. You can."

"Who should it be told to Kitty at all?"

"Let her marry the man, then, knowing the truth." I detest deception more than you do. I have never practiced it on you have."

"Miss Brake!"

"You deceived your father when you married my brother secretly, did you not?" Hester asked.

"Ah, madam, you might have spared me that reproach!" cried Lucy. "It is late in the day to stab me. And I loved your brother or truly and as well!"

"Too well," muttered Hester: "but I am fighting hard to-day not to think of Harris."

"And to thwart John Woodhatch."

"He will be none of the wisdom of this presently," she added, taking Lucy's arm, "will answer for him."

"Hester," said Lucy, suddenly, "I will not Kitty, then."

"What?"

"Before the day is out, if you will promise to be silent."

"I promise. More, I am grateful to you, Lucy, for your offer."

When they were at the open window of the front parlor, she stopped again, and said:

"You see now, Lucy, why I did not wish Kitty Vanch to think too much of you. She will go back with me to my house, meeting all my affection. She will begin a new life side by side with me. That is," she added, "if I live. If I die, then take care of her in God's name. I have arranged for that."

"But is it probable anything that I can say will part her from Greg, after all? Will she be not likely to forgive him?" asked Lucy. "It is not more than probable she will?"

Miss Brake looked at her steadily. "Yes, it is," she answered.

"Therefore what reason—"

"Leave the rest to me. I have your promise, Lucy Brake," was the reply.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON THE HIGH-ROAD.

Yes, she had her promise, thought Lucy, as her eccentric sister in law passed out of her sight; but it was a different promise from that which Hester thought she had exacted. If Hester Brake preferred to speak in riddles, so did she; if the elder woman would not be frank with her, and only drop mysterious hints and make dire threats, it must be her own mission, thought Lucy, and in her woman's way, to foil her. For it had come to feeling Hester Brake, if possible—almost to distrusting her and the motives which might be lurking to the depths of her secretive nature.

She sneered Kitty to herself, and did not wish to part with her, she had taken a dislike to Greg Dorward, just as she had once taken a dislike to her, and she had been keen and watchful enough to learn a secret, and to surprise Lucy by its sudden revelation. For her own selfishness it seemed possible that Hester would plot to bring about the separation of these lovers—for they were lovers now—and Lucy, full of sympathy with them and interest in them, would do her best to stop this. Heaven knows there was not as much happiness in life that one should seek to mar it by a word, and in her warm, generous impulse Lucy shrank with horror from the thought of dashing down one hope of Kitty Vanch's. She would tell her the truth, but in a way that she believed would not affect Kate very much, and at least it would spare her Hester Brake's construction of the facts. And she would tell Greg Dorward first what had been resolved upon, and ask his advice concerning it, and his permission to speak to Kitty to her own gentle way.

Here was a new incentive to life, and she set about her task without much fear, and with considerable faith in the result. There was something to do, and a new incentive to be active, and Lucy after a while felt lighter and yet stronger for the cause she had resolved to espouse. What Hester Brake might think of her propriety for siding with the young couple whom she had wished to separate did not affect her greatly. Lucy had made up her mind, if not to dislike Hester Brake, to be distrustful of her, and at the very best only to pity her. To wish to part Greg and Kitty, because she thought Greg loved another—which Lucy did not know herself for certain now—was too hard and cruel a task for a nature like her own. She believed in these two and their future, and she had listened to Kitty's rhapsody concerning Greg and her life to come with him until her own heart—still young and not free from romance—had opened at the other's frankness, and taken warmth and hope from hers.

Lucy did not trust herself with Kitty yet awhile. In the afternoon she and little Morice strolled along the quiet country road toward Blenthorpe village in order to meet Greg Dorward and tell him what had occurred. After all, he might refuse her permission, or think it would be better to tell Kitty for himself, and Lucy's word had been pledged to Greg first. And after all, and in any way, it would not matter a great deal—it was a "toss about nothing," she said, smiling to herself, and with no small confidence in her own powers of setting this little matter in its proper light.

Lucy had still calculated time and distance, about three miles from the farm, and where she had thought she might encounter Greg on his homeward journey, if he were anxious to meet them all at the tea table—he came trotting rapidly along the road. He did not see them both till he was close upon them, he was so deep in thought—and a thought that was grave enough to furrow his brow and give a dark and angry look to his face—but at first glimpse of Lucy he raised his hat and sprang from his horse.

"I did not expect to see you, Mrs Brake," he said, with his face aglow with smiles now. "You are taking a long walk with Morice. Is it not too far for her?"

"She is a good walker. And I wanted to meet you at a fair distance from the farm," answered Lucy.

"Indeed?" said Greg, with one of his quick glances, by which he seemed to read the facts confronting him, and which had been of patent to Bolter's hosts and Periwinkle's in the new existence at Skegg Shore. "What has happened?"

He associated her presence with some disaster at once, it was his nature, perhaps, and he was full of foreboodings, like the rest of them, and doubted the dead calmness which reigned at Farm Forlorn.

"Are you strong enough to bear a little trouble, Greg?"

"I am always prepared for it," was the answer, said in as deep and even mournful a tone that Lucy regarded him wonderingly. He noted her look, and said: "I do not believe this peace can last. It does not seem to fit in with my life, with Kitty's, or anybody's here."

"I am sorry to add unpleasant news, Greg, to your present frame of thought. But such a little trouble as what I said you will," she said.

"Morice?" he said, interrogatively.

"She is not listening. She will not understand us."

"Very well."

They walked on side by side, Greg's hand upon the bridle of his horse. People might have thought them lovers, had they chanced to pass that way, they spoke in such faint tones, and he bent his head so low to hear her story. He was very attentive, and did not interrupt her by a word, and once or twice he glanced at little Morice to note if she were listening too, or was likely to comprehend the explanation which the young mother offered of the incidents of the morning.

"I thought it was only fair I should tell you all this, and warn you," said Lucy, in conclusion.

"Thank you," he answered. "I did not think I had so true a friend. I am very deeply obliged to you, Mrs. Brake, for putting me on guard against an enemy."

"She is hardly an enemy," said Lucy; "she is thinking probably more of Kitty than yourself, and her disposition is so variable that she may become your friend, and take your part even, before your marriage day."

"Very probably," answered Greg Dorward, "for I do not consider Miss Brake responsible for all she says and does. You will forgive me if I join you by this opinion; but it is mine. I think it is the master's."

"I hope it is wrong," said Lucy, not telling him that her own opinion, at times, almost coincided with his own. "And now will you trust Kitty to me to relate this story of a foolish fancy, as I have promised Miss Brake I would?"

"Kitty is strange. How will she receive such a story from you? How will you tell it?" he required.

"Can not you trust me?"

"With my life."

She would not notice his impetuosity, but continued, very calmly:

"I can assure her honestly that never in my life have I thought of you with any affection"—he shrugged his shoulders at this—"save the respect of one friend for another," she added; "that I was glad to hear of the engagement between her and you, and thought it was best for both; that you have had a boy's fancy, a boy's folly, whilst away from her, and it is ended now completely; that you are looking forward to the future with her, as to no other future which could give you happiness."

Greg listened or patiently as he had done to her story of Miss Brake's interposition.

"Yes," he said, listlessly; "tell her that, if you like."

"And on the truth?"

"Heaven knows what is the truth," he said, in a deeper tone, "neither you nor I, Lucy Brake, as yet."

"But—"

"Tell her what you please; I think, with you, it is better in your hands. She will you can to make this a light and pleasant jest, and so spare her. I shouldn't like," he added, thoughtfully, "to make her unhappy, she's too good and honest for that. And yet—"

"And yet—what?" asked Lucy, as he came to a full stop.

"How will she receive your version of the matter? She is not like you, or any other woman, but herself. She will think evil, are, perhaps," he added, gloomily, "that this is the beginning of the end."

"I do not understand you now, Greg."

"No. Better, Lucy, that you should not."

He sprang into his saddle, and to Lucy Brake's astonishment turned his horse's head to the direction which he had come.

"I will find my way to the farm by another route," he said, "it will be better that I don't see Kitty yet. You will meet her coming along this road, and she will be surprised to find you instead of her old sweetheart. God speed you, and good-day!"

Lucy could almost fancy, looking up at his grave face, that there were tears swimming in his eyes; but that was hardly possible in a young man of so firm a character, and oh to fight a trouble, after all, to bear. And before she was certain, he had ridden away at full speed, and left her to carry out her task, self-imposed, and in her fashion she might choose to adopt. She went on, wondering somewhat at Greg's manner, and the way in which he had received the news; and presently, Kitty Vanch in the distance—and in the bright sunshine—was seen upon the high-road.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE woman in Louisville who shot her partner because he doctored no humble her furnished an argument in favor of dueling schools which extreme moralists will find difficult to refute.

THE Montreal Witness says that in Maitland recently a pump was inserted in a well that had been drilled through thirty feet of solid rock, and the first thing brought to the surface was a live toad. The name of the milkman who had previously used the pump is withheld.

FIFTY-TWO tramps who applied for shelter at a police station in this city on a recent cold night were put under arrest. When they were searched, whiskey bottles were found on twenty of them. Who can consider the condition of the other thirty-two and still maintain that this is not a hard winter?

A SHOWER of mud is reported from California. There being no political campaign to progress there, the occurrence is mentioned as a phenomenon.

A PHILADELPHIAN has obtained a verdict in his favor in a libel suit against Mind and Matter, a publication of that city. There have been symptoms of mind over matter and of matter over mind but this is a case of the triumph of the plaintiff over both.

UNDER the Canadian law, a building can not be exempt from taxation unless it is used exclusively by her religious workers. The city of Montreal has made a claim for taxes against the Temple Emanu-el on the ground that a fair was recently held in the building for profit.

ADDITIONAL evidence that this is a hard winter comes from Chicago, where a single pawnbroker has lent money on twenty-two hundred revolvers.

THE history of a California post-office was told the other day in the Star Route suit. Mr. Walters, ex-postmaster of the Greenwood office, was asked in cross-examination to tell where Greenwood is, and he frankly acknowledged that he could not do it. He said ther he lived in a tent, and wherever his tent happened to be pitched, there was Greenwood.

STATISTICS show that it is a misnomer to style Brooklyn the City of Churches. There is one church to every 1988 persons in Brooklyn, but at least four other large cities of the country have more churches in proportion to the population.

MARION, MATTIE, and RACHEL CHALLIS are three little sisters whose home is in Minisink, Hartland. Becoming interested on the effort to endow HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE Cot, they last summer resolved to work for it, and on December 18 they held a fair in the Minisink school-house, the result of which was a contribution of $100, sent to the treasurer of the fund. Of the $2000 necessary more than $1600 have now been raised by the little readers of YOUNG PEOPLE.

AN authority says that the wasp works two hours to the bee's one. The bee is assisted to devote much shining hour to gathering honey, whereas the wasp stays up nights devising and executing plans to stow himself away in the lining of the unsuspecting farmer's Sunday trousers.

A LADY who has recently returned from Europe, where she visited the art galleries of Berlin, Dresden, and Munich, is credited with having said that "for versatility of invention and variety of style none of the other German painters can compare with Eschebenet, a woman who figures prominently in the galleries of all three of those cities." It is presumable that her favorite English author is Anon.

"THE Democrats of Maine have sworn off from fusion." Now let them continue the good work by swearing off from fuel.

MAINE and New Hampshire are suffering greatly from a winter drought. Very little rain has fallen in those States since June. Mills are stopped, lumbermen are unable to float their logs, farmers can not get water for their cattle, and the resulting scarcity of money in circulation is severely felt by the tradesmen. "If rain does not come soon," says the Boston Globe, "the consequences will be appalling." An electrical shower in the West of unusual intensity is another odd feature of the present winter.

AT half past eight o'clock the other morning Governor Butler was making the rounds of the departments at the State House to see whether the occupants were there on time. It is not stated whether he inspired the tardy officials to stay after working hours and make up lost time.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the coinage of five-cent nickel pieces of a new design. The new coin will be one millimeter heavier than that he circulation at present, and will be a little larger in circumference and thinner. On the face will be a woman's head, bound with a fillet on which will be the word "Liberty," the whole surrounded by thirteen stars. The reverse will show the figure 5 inscribed representing the denomination of the coin within a wreath. The description of the proposed coin seems to preclude the possibility of its being so ugly as the one which is to give place to it. Mexico is also going into the coinage of nickel pieces, and chiefly for supplying that government with nickel coin, two, and five cent pieces to the value of some four million dollars having been shipped recently from this city.

ELEPHANTS IN WINTER-QUARTERS.

IF our readers will turn to page 105 of HARPER'S WEEKLY for 1882 they will find a full description, with illustrations by Mr JAMES C. BEARD, of the manner in which the animals belonging to Mr BARNUM'S establishment are housed, tended, and trained during the winter months in many respects what may be called the home life of these animals is more favorable to the study of their habits and disposition than is their life of show and exhibition on the road, where they are constantly put through the monotonal tricks which they have been taught for the amusement of the public. There is something wonderful in the performances to which intelligent animals can be trained; and yet it is a pity that the public taste should demand a training which is not in accordance with natural aptitude. The movements of a well-ridden horse in the ring are graceful and beautiful, while nothing can be more ungraceful than the action of the same animal prancing round on his hind legs in a so-called waltz. But the public will applaud the waltz more loudly than the natural action, as it will an elephant for standing on its head or balancing itself on a barrel.

The favored few to whom Mr BARNUM grants permission to visit his animals in their winter-quarters enjoy the opportunity of seeing these creatures at their ease or well as in the process of training for exhibition. Both phases of elephant life are depicted in the sketches which were recently made by Mr F. S. CHURCH, reproduced on page 56. Some of these sketches are, of course, humorous exaggerations; but the incident of the elephant declining to be sketched was a real occurrence. While Mr. CHURCH was sketching he observed that his subject was becoming uneasy, and was eying him with evident suspicion, at the same time twisting up a wad of hay with his trunk. Mr CHURCH went on with his work, however, until the elephant, his patience apparently exhausted, suddenly hurled the hard wad with unerring aim at the artist's head, which finished the sitting for that day.

WINTER TRAVEL IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE enormous snow-plough represented on page 57 is well known in Minnesota as a famous road-breaker through the heavy falls of snow which frequently cause a temporary blockade on the railway lines. It is named "The Snowking," and when propelled by two strong engines will penetrate the largest drifts and clear the track for the passage of trains. When driven at full speed, it flings the snow right and left to great distances, and to sometimes entirely hide from view in the flying cloud it raises.

The smaller pictures on the same page represent scenes which are familiar to every winter traveller in the Northwest, but of which those who only read of them at the cozy breakfast table can hardly form a conception. Often a passenger train is stopped by the snow on the wild prairie miles and miles away from any settlement, and is obliged to remain there until the track can be cleared. Meanwhile wolves serenade the passengers by night, from a safe distance, and Indians—friendly ones—tramp over the drifts on snow-shoes to pay them a visit. It sometimes happens that a train is so long delayed that the passengers are compelled to wade or a great distance through the snow to search of food from lonely settlers, who rarely refuse to share their store with them. Winter travel in the Northwest has its picturesque side, especially when enjoyed by the aid of the artist's note-book; but the artist who thus contributes to the pleasure of our readers can certify that it also has its full share of discomforts and annoyances.

FRESCOES.*

BY OUIDA.

Mr. Hollys, Villa Ghirsetta, Cannes, to Lord Llandulas, St. Gowan's, Merioneth.

"DEAR LLANDY,—I have run over here for two days to see the object of our mutual anxiety, Vic is near too, by my advice: he's got his old tub in the Villefranche bay. I think she is looking wearied; she says very little to me. I asked her about Renzo, and she said, very coolly, that he was in England at work on the frescoes; and hang me if I could muster up cheek enough to say any more. She has a way of looking at you that shuts you up at once. I pleaded Vic's cause, but I suppose very badly, for she only looked bored, and said it was a pity to bring boys out anywhere near that horrid Monte Carlo. She had been there herself, and couldn't see why people cared to go, but they did, and I had far better send Vic home. I objected that an English Duke aged four-and-twenty, who was in the Life-Guards, was not to be treated like a child in the nursery. She looked more bored, and asked me the name of a horrid cactus that looks like a tennis racquet covered with bristles. I don't know its name, I don't know why such a creature should have a name at all. I me out of temper. I candidly confess it. I me very fond of Eunice, and I don't like being treated as if I were somebody seen at the gaming tables or the railway station for the first time to-day. I don't like Mrs Alsager much, who is staying with her, and does her no good. When I tried to get something out of Mrs A as to Renzo, the answer only laughed, and said she thought he was coming here. The C of C is in bed with a chill. She sends me little pencil notes three or four times a day—agonizing, frigid, terrible little c'Cannes. She evidently considers I could marry Eunice to Vic, out of hand if I did my duty. She has fever from the sun, rheumatism from the mistral, cholera typhus in the rose-buds beneath her windows, and cholera in the mignonette; so invisible, impotent, and still terrible, restricts her diet to Liebig and her receptacle to the English clergyman, if Renzo come to Cannes, she will, she declares to me, be carried out of her bed in a chaise à porteurs to die. On the whole, the atmosphere is depressing despite a magnificent barometer, a gay thermometer, and a sun and a sea forever smiling. I don't see what I can do. As I said before, if Eunice mean it, she'll do it, and say only hope is in the man himself. I don't believe he will come to Cannes, and I do believe he is too great an artist to be a blackguard. I go back to Rome to-night, and me thankful. I feel like a fool when I look at Eunice and tell myself that I don't dare to ask her a point-blank question. But you didn't dare either.

"Sincerely yours, H H.

"P.S.—Vic lost a hundred thousand francs yesterday over there, and he would go back this morning first train. Leish Dé is at the Hôtel de Paris, and I am very greatly afraid she'll get hold of him."

Louis Renzo, Milton Street, to Don Eccellino Ferrara, Fiorisella-supra Subiaco.

"You were over then I dont old friend. I me in an English journal which I orn yist spell not that the young Duke is at Cannes also. Will she end to doing what all her friends wish? It must take so much courage, so much constance, in a woman to resist the pressure of her world; and she is courageous, but not constant. At least I should ns no. I may ch bee hoc much in the first day I know her. The days go by dreamly, and are very cold and dark. I am glad when the night comes, and the lamps are lit, and the big dog and I see shoes after dinner in this library which has become almost a home to me. The head keeper asked me yesterday if I would not go out shooting. I could me that no words could have measured the night of his soon when he had learnt that nothing would induce me to kill any bird or beast that lives. The entire household think me a harmless lunatic, but they begin to like me.

"I work sedulously at the frescoes when the light permits; I ride sometimes; I read a good deal. There are thousands of Latin and of French books, and some few Italian ones. Her portrait stands on a large easel at the north end of the library. Both the dog Berwick and I look at it, and regret—in our divers ways. I am sure that he knows it is here.

"If was Natale yesterday; a great deal was given away in her name by the stewards to all the poor for many miles around, but the people looked to me sullen. Perhaps they feel that she does not care a straw about them, or know A from B amongst them. It is a pity. She might so easily make herself beloved. At the end of my solitary dinner they brought me the national pudding—a gorgeous, indigestible globe; I thought it very nasty, Berwick approved and ate it. Today there is a violent snow-storm. The whole country is white; the pews look very grand against the snow. I have been out and seen the deer fed. Nerina nibbled at her turnips from my hand. It is intensely cold. I pity the peasantry. The stewards give away a great deal of coal and clothing.

"She has sent me another little letter; she says she is sitting amongst geraniums in full flower on the edge of a marble wall overlooking a blue sea with the thermometer at 70° Réaumur in the sun. She asks me if I sometimes do not envy that. I envy the flowers that are near her—yes—but I answer her merely, and that is the truth, too, that I am growing enamored of these keen winds, this white landscape, these sombre woods, these dusky, oak-panelled chambers with their warm fires and their painted ovals. Perhaps I grow so fond of them because I know that in a little while I shall leave them forever, and no place will know me on more.

"I have made a discovery which overwhelms me so that I can scarcely see the paper on which I write to you. I have discovered documents that make me believe I was the legitimate son of the Earl Alured, at least so it seems to me, beyond any possibility of error. This is how I found them. Forgive me if I be incoherent. In arranging the drawings, etchings, etc., I had the permission of minde to open all drawers, cabinets, and cases, she gave me an old and very imperfect manuscript catalogue to help me. In one corner of the library there is a secretaire of the Louis XV. work. It was full of old letters, old cards, old sketches; I did not like to touch these, though she had expressly told me to look anywhere I chose. As I was about to close the doors of the bureau I espied—I must have accidentally touched some unseen spring, for a panel turned and a secret drawer shot out, in the drawer was a packet of letters, a curl of dark hair, and a folded paper. I lifted the paper to re-shut the little drawer, and then saw that it was a record of their marriage in the church of S Helena, in Rome. I copy it below; you may there is no reasonable doubt of it. I will write you more to-morrow. I feel stunned, and the room goes round with me. If I me not the sport of a delirious dream—oh God, if my mother were living!

"My letter was too late for the post last night. I add all I know. I send you copies of the letters that were tied up with my mother's hair They are her letters—cara amante!—Italian, illwrit, overfond; telling so little and yet saying all. I see the whole story in those piteous letters. He married her privately, and was ashamed of her, and she was left in obscurity, and he went into the world, and then came jealousy and misunderstanding and rage and doubt on her side, and anger and indifference on his, and there must have been some Iago near to suggest to her the doubt that her marriage had been only a farce, and so she ran away blindly, madly, to her own old home and found her father dead. There are only her letters. There is nothing to tell us what Lord Charterys thought or did. I imagine he was a heartless man, who found his liberty welcome and did not seek her, and so never knew of me. I dare say he was ashamed of his folly in wedding a peasant girl from the Sabine hills. One can not tell. That is all a blank. But the records of the marriage are clear. The date is thirty four years ago. I me his lawful son. I am her cousin.

"Two days have passed since I wrote you. I am somewhat calmer. A deep gladness has succeeded the madness of my first amazement. The chance is gone off my life. I am my mam's equal now. I do not know whether these things would content the law; they content me! How strange the hand of fate that led me here? My poor mother! how plainly one sees her story in those letters! The passion, and pain, and jealousy, and doubt, and all the painful weakness and ignorance, are so sacred to me. They did not touch him; I suppose they only irritated him. Some men are made so. When they are thus, women only break their hearts on them like frail ships on a rock. He must have been cruel to her. I can not forgive him. But what I think of more than of her or of him—Heaven pardon me!—is Eunice. I may call her or now. I shall stand in her place, she will have me. After being the recipient of her goodness and her gentleness, I shall despoil her of her kingdom if ever I make this known. It is of who me Lord Charterys! She will have me. ——I here been out to the great dusky woods. It is very cold and the wind is high, but it did me good; it quited the fever in me. I feel as if I had done her some unreasonable wrong. This in childish, I know, but I can not help myself. If she had not trusted me with these library keys I should never have known my own rights.

"To-day my friend in Rome sent me word on one would buy the sketches, but he sold a little marble that I had, which is said to be of Mino di Fiesole, for thirty napoleons, which he sends me. I will go up to London, and get the address of a great lawyer from our consul there, and take the lawyer's opinions on the facts. I shall give him no names, or there will be nothing risked. I have spoken of the Earl Alured with the landsteward, who knew him well. He describes him as a wayward, incontinent, and unstable man. He was thrown by his horse shying near these very gates, and died instantly on the road. Perhaps had he lived he might have sought my mother out in after-years. I will try to think so.

"I have been to London and seen a famous man of law. I showed him copies of all the documents, without any names to them, and after careful examination he gave it as his opinion that the marriage was quite legal (as a merely religious marriage was so at that period in Italy, and this evil was of our own religion, so the whole race was in old days), and that the proofs were sufficient to give the son by such a marriage title to inherit, provided the son was distinctly proved to have been born at the date I described. That, we know, is easily done. The lawyer said there would be, no doubt, long litigation; the other side would contest; marriages in Italy before the Independence were irregular and often secret, and so subject to suspicion; the case would go up to the House of Lords, it would be long, but there could be no doubt, he thought, of the ultimate result if the facts and the papers were as I stated to him. I thanked him, and came back here.

"When the great gates were thrown open in the twilight I felt that I came home. It was very odd to know that I was the owner, the master here; no English earl—I! Then as I sat before the hearth with her dog's head on my knee, other thoughts came over me. The lawyer had said the other side would contest. The cold sentence had gone to my heart like a knife. She and I should be enemies! There would be nothing for either of us to be ashamed of in the facts that would be made public, yet it would be hateful—we should be foes. The lawyer, indeed, suggested that perhaps the present owner of the property and name might yield without law if convinced of the justice and veracity of the claim. Yes; she would yield at once, my beautiful proud cousin! She would go out of my house, and leave me master here, and never see my face again! What should I have profited?—and there is a meanness and a treason about it, too: but for her condescension to me, her trust in me, I could never have known this. I could never even have guessed that my poor mother had wronged herself by her hasty flight and unhappy suspicions, and that I had been born to wedlock. It seems treacherous, mean-like, to use the results to dispossess her of her heritage. This is what torments me; I can see no way by which I can come by my own without injury and pain to her.

"There is more still to remember as I say, when once she knows that I am the Earl Alured's legitimate heir, she will wish for no decision of the court; she will scorn to defend herself by any legal quibble or flaw that may present itself; she will give up everything, and—hate me for ever. Or, even if she be so generous as not to hate me as a usurper, she could never, she would never, forgive the man who took advantage of a search which she permitted to him, of a sojourn to which she invited him, and whilst he stood beneath her roof used his leisure to undermine her claims—claims that the law and the world have allowed her all her life. Even if she believed all these papers to be genuine (and she might even not believe that), she would despise the person who brought them forward against her. This is my torture, my perplexity. So well I love her that to be recognized as the Earl of Charterys by all England will avail me nothing if I lose her smiles. Though her honor be cleared, and my pride in now a permissible thing, I am more miserable than I was before I opened that secretaire. I see no way by which I can make good my title and yet retain her love. If I show her these papers, I must seem her foe forever; I may seem a traitor too. I would sooner remain Ludovic Renzo whom she respects, and whom—perhaps—she loves. Counsel me, dear and reverend friend."

THE ICE PALACE IN MONTREAL.

DANCING in an ice house may strike the dweller in temperate zones as a somewhat stiff and cheerless form of recreation. At the same time the spirit of our arctic and antarctic contemporaries in accepting the rigors of their respective climates, and pretending that they like them, is worthy of praise. The glad spontaneity with which the students chose the only available horse of Hobson for an illustrious precedent. Since Russia and Canada can not be moved ten or fifteen degrees toward the tropics with the autumnal equinox, their people do well not merely to fence themselves against the cold with such palliatives as furs and blubber and hot toddies, but to maintain that they enjoy the winter. They deamblessly tobogg an even when they have to rub frost bitten noses with snow and handle brittle ears with extreme caution; and they propose at Montreal to waltz, or at least to promenade, through colonnades and under glittering roofs of ice by the cold glare of the electric light.

This year, indeed, the Montrealers (or should they be called the Mountaineers-Royal?) have hidden defiance to their fate with an ostentation heretofore unknown. Their ice palace is not the first in the world by many. It was a hundred and forty odd years ago—in the winter of 1740, to be exact—that the first ice palace celebrated in authentic history reared its crystal battlements on the shores of swampy Nova, and ice palaces along that river are now regular features of the St. Petersburg social season. But that "eligible winter residence," which everybody pretends to know all about, and which nobody, not even a cyclopedia, seems really to know anything about, would have been laughed to scorn and tepid water by the Montrealer of 1883. For the "palace" of Canrien Anna was only fifty five feet long by fifty wide and twenty high, while the central tower of the palace on Dominion Square will reach the height of one hundred and fifty feet, and its other dimensions, to may be inferred from the illustration, are upon a really palatial scale. Adherents to "truth" in architecture will, however, be shocked to remark that the constructor of the Montreal palace has not confined himself to doing what could be done with his material, but has made a hidden frame-work of timber for his towers of ostensible crystal, and has constructed his roof of poles covered with cedar brush. After this frame-work is complete, it is to be expected that cuties of Mission extraction will throw cold water on the architect's efforts.

It is not said that the Montreal people have emulated the Russian Czarina in establishing an cannons before the portals of the palace, from which ice balls could be, as the historian absurdly asserts, fired, or, as he meant to assert, expelled, without exploding them until they struck the target. But we can not expect the Canadians to emulate the Russians in all things glacial, since ice commonly forms on the Neva to the thickness of more than three feet—a figure which, we believe, the St. Lawrence has not yet attained; and loyal Canadians will read with envy that in a mill at Yakutsk, the earth was once found firmly frozen to a depth of 382 feet.

But if the Canadians do not emulate the Czarina in "firing" frozen cannon, they do emulate the American small boy and Pietro di Medici, at whose order Michael Angelo modelled a statue of snow, in applying their abundant crystalline material to the plastic arts. Two sentinels of snow guard the entrance to the palace, and if the condition of the snow permits, it has been intended to build also two Esquimau huts. Mr Ruskin "takes on" a good deal, in his eloquent way, about the injudicious conduct of the Florentine Dogs in setting Michael Angelo to do ephemeral work. A statue of ice has its disadvantages, perhaps, in a liability to confusion between the shadows and the reflections, but only think what we might have been spared if half the statues in Washington had been made of molten ice instead of molten bronze!

In all circumstances, the preparations for the Canadian Carnival seem to have been made with the utmost intelligence and liberality, and they ought to secure a brilliant success. The arrangements have been in charge of a committee of citizens, and the sports have been planned by consultation of all the curling, skating, snow shoe, and tobogganing clubs. The programme begins with the "inauguration" of the ice palace on the 23d, and extends over the rest of the week. It includes contests in trotting on the St. Lawrence, curling and skating, snow-shoe races and steeplechases, a fancy-dress carnival at the skating rink, a ball at the Windsor Hotel, and a torch-light procession of all the snow-shoe clubs. The Mayors of other Canadian cities and of New York and Boston, and Governors of States adjacent to Canada, have been officially invited to attend the Carnival, which promises to be memorable in the annals of Montreal. Rooms have been engaged during the period of the festivities for many families of New York and other American cities.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN EXPECTED.

By Mrs. FRANK McSATHY.

ONE wild March night, not many years ago, ten young men walked rapidly through the main street of a crude Western settlement. There was little attempt at paving, as the place seemed to be scooped out of the solid rock which hemmed it in. The width of the street was a serious drawback to its distinction. The houses on either side, slanting down from the hills behind them, dilapidated, detached, and with little or no attempt at architecture, became more insignificant by the long distances which separated them and their grim surroundings. An icy wind, that grew more and more violent at night fall, congealed all inclination for conversation, but the younger of these pilgrims muttered through his chattering teeth,

"God forsaken, beastly hole, Max!"

"Not altogether," replied his companion. "Look yonder, Tom!"

The wind, increasing in velocity, drove before it the murky clouds that had rested upon the jagged hill-tops, and all at once could be seen a hundred martial, nonsense, and grotesque shapes clearly defined upon the sky. Myriads of stars began to glow with wonderful brilliancy, but the younger traveller gazed longingly upon the dense lights of the railroad depot that shone hopefully in the distance. The wide parlors of a country store loomed in sight; cheerful arrays of patent medicines with their gaudy placards adorned the windows, the battered and broken-nosed figure of an Indian medicine incensed the presence of tobacco to the coy worn traveller—and Tom began to soften with these signs of approaching civilization.

"We'll soon shake the dust of this wretched place from our feet, Max," he said. "I've had a nasty presentiment hanging over me all day that something would happen here; but there's the blessed old dancing eye of the engine at last."

It all happened in a quarter of a minute, even as Tom spoke. A wagon came rapidly down the steep cross-street, the driver evidently endeavoring, as he saw an old woman on the crossing, to arrest the speed of his vehicle; his beast was intelligent enough to aid him in this endeavor, but the grade was steep, and the old woman stumbled. Max sprang forward just in time to lift her to her less. As he rose to his own the sheft of the wagon gave him a rough poke upon the leg, which made him wince. For a moment, but he carried his fight hueden to the corner, where the struggled down out of his arms, saying, in the weak, tremulous quaver of age, "Thank ye, thank ye, young sonr," and hobbled away upon her stick in the gloom.

The man in the wagon called out: "All right, boss? Nobody hurt, I reckon?"

"All right—nobody hurt," echoed Max, and the wagon went rattling on.

The old woman had already disappeared; the engine was belching forth flame and steam only a few rods away. In less than five minutes Tom was filling the brackets over their heads in the car with their travelling traps, and singing softly,

"I got broke at playing poker,
Three of a kind."

This was Tom's favorite paean of joy. He never got beyond the one line and the refrain, but these seemed to suffice him. He broke off shortly, however, upon looking at his companion. Max was deathly pale, a white quiver about his mouth had a premonition of ghastly faintness about it.

"Halle, old fellow," cried Tom, "you was hurt, after all; take a swig of this."

He poured some liquor down the throat of Max from a little brown flask, which quickly brought him round, but Tom remained anxious.

"Where's the trouble, Max?" he said.

"Only a blow on the leg," said Max. "I shouldn't wonder if there was a black and blue spot there as big as your hand; but that's all. I'm tired and hungry; let's eat something."

They fell to upon a little supper which Tom brought from the recesses of his travelling bag. The train started on. Max regained his fine floral complexion. Presently he let his head rest upon his hand, and closed his eyes in a light and easy slumber. Tom drew a breath of relief. The train increased in speed. As it went spinning rumbled the very cockles of poor Tom's heart warmed at the thought of home. He pulled up the collar of his overcoat, extended his feet upon the luxurious upholstery of the seat ahead, folded his hat into a pillow, and was soon mingling his humble snore with the continuous rattle and occasional shriek of the railway train. With the morning came an amelioration of the cold, but it brought with it fog and mud. The nine miles' ride at the close of the second day, over an ocean country in a lumbering stage-coach, wrung sometimes from Max an exclamation that was nearly akin to a groan, but he had been a little stiff when he got off the train. Tom thought it was the awkward position in which he had slept. He began now to be of the opinion that a touch of rheumatism might be at the bottom of the trouble.

"We'll give it a rub with some of Aunt Em's liniment when we get home," said Tom, with a satisfaction upon the last word. Tom wouldn't have believed it possible he could have been so ridiculously glad to get back to stupid old Barnesville, he had been so grateful to get away from it, at that time, he had made up his mind that in the whole range of the States he could not stumble upon a duller, more perversely stagnant and exasperating spot than the village of which his father was so proud. It settled him beyond endurance after he got back from college to see his father stand with his back to the dining room grate, his hands folded beneath his coat tails, and hold forth as the boss upon the petty themes discussed in the City Council, of which he was an influential member. A sword hung conspicuously over the mantel piece, which seemed to Tom to crown the absurdity of the scene. The little attention Tom had given to the sanguinary incidents during his collegiate course increased his contempt for the regiment of home guards at Barnesville, of which his father was the colonel, and the approach of Washington's birthday quickened Tom's decision to join his friend Max Belling in that venture out to the mining districts.

"Why, you'd better stay till after the twenty-second," said Aunt Em, who was busy with silken flags and rosettes at a side table. "Merry's coming home from school on purpose, you know."

"Yes," said the colonel, "I thought it judicious to send for Amerion—in—a—fact, I believe she is to personate the Goddess of Liberty, she is tall for her age, you know."

Yes, Tom knew she was taller of fourteen than most girls at twenty. He was exceedingly fond and proud of his sister, but he went, nevertheless.

Tom left Barnesville without a single regret, nor vowed in his heart that many a year should go by before he should again see the white houses and green blinds, and little front gardens, and neat palings, and pleader saplings of elms and ash trees and maples that at stated distances marked so many miles of his father's domain. The young lad of twenty, in the innocence and arrogance of youth, thought of many a lively jaunt and tournament that awaited him yonder, which made the present placid surroundings insipid beyond degree.

Five years had gone by, and he was coming back again, with a lively suspect for the fleshpots of Egypt. He had spent all the money left him by his dead mother, a considerable sum loaned him by his father, not to mention some little savings of Aunt Em's. He had spent all that money, and was coming back for more. Yet he had not been given to riotous living. Heaven knew the simple fare upon which he had served, the rough raiment he had worn. The money had all gone in unfortunate ventures in the mining districts. His friend Max had risked and lost even more than Tom. Fortune was a fickle jade, and led them a pair and dance, but at last the luck seemed to their favor, and now the tide had turned. All this new investment wanted was a little more capital, and their fortunes were made. His father had a clear head for business; it would be an easy matter to assure him that the venture was a safe one, and at last the future would be secured. Tom thought this all over as they jogged along on the stage-coach, and as the familiar old landmarks began to appear he put down his coat collar, brushed his hat with his sleeve, pulled his pantaloons down over his boots, and began to feel that he was Thomas Jefferson Barnes, the only son of Colonel Barnes of Barnesville. His dark, thin, eager face grew more and more jubilant as the fine fertile lands of the old homestead were passed. Acre after acre of orchard and meadow and woodland was pointed out as the property of Colonel Barnes, and presently the jaded horses began to pull up the hill to the big, square, comfy painted mansion that crowned its summit. A crimson flame from the setting sun burned in each window-pane, a brandnew flag floated from a new flag-staff, and a second portico and observatory had been added to the already fine and dedicated building.

A few hours later the elder of our pilgrims found himself arrayed in the one extra suit that he had worn upon state occasions for an incredible period of time—a sack coat and pantaloons of blue flannel, and a high military vest, indeed, the whole appearance of Max smacked of the martial. His skin was bronzed by exposure, gray his hair had been toned by the elements to a dozen different tinctes of reddish-brown. His shoulders were square, and his big shapely head had a trick of inclining forward upon his breast, which somewhat detracted from his extraordinary height, but gave him, the colonel thought, a Napoleonic air of deliberation and distinction. The colonel was positive that Max had seen some sort of service; the stiffness in his leg was immediately accounted for by the frosting of an old wound Tom humored this fancy, but begged his father not to mention it in the presence of his friend, as he was particularly sensitive upon this point.

"Modest attributes that very commonly belong to heroic natures," acquiesced the colonel. He was standing in his old attitude before the dining room grate, his feet far apart, his hands beneath the tails of his coat. Max was tormented by an idea that the colonel closely resembled a heavy sheep that had been a pensioner upon the mining camp for many years—the peculiar triangular shape of his head, which was pointed at the bottom, long and narrow, clean thereon and bald, the expressionless of the face, bland, timid, deprecating, yet persistent; even the blatant tones of his voice, which went beyond Max, and reached a small, daintily dressed, neat, and dapper gentleman, who had been introduced as Mr Fry, a promising lawyer in a neighboring city, and a candidate for the Legislature. Max found his feet sinking into a fine velvet carpet, and above his head the ceiling was frescoed in what he supposed was the prevailing style of the day. Chandeliers of crystal shed rivers of light upon striking pictures in gorgeous frames, upon the satin, brocatelle, and ebony of the furniture, and even as Max's eyes rested upon one of the heavily belaced and upholstered windows that lined the apartment, it resolved itself into a door, through which glided a tall slender girl, with bare shoulders, and magnificent black eyes that rendered the rest of her face pale by contrast. Her ears and neck, arms and fingers, Max thought, were disfigured by chains and rings, and when he took her out to dinner, his stiff leg became awkwardly entangled in her long train. The weather-beaten red in his cheeks deepened, and he did not know how much he was discountenanced until Miss American, tripped of him and to begin to hum her for the accident.

Max bowed with scant and stiff courtesy, and wondered how this young woman with the ridiculous name of American could be the little sister that Tom so adored. She talked too much, and as if she had known Max for years (which she had, in truth, through her brother's letters), she was overdressed and too handsome, and too conscious of a loveliness that Max never could admire; she was able as stare a fellow out of countenance, and it was very difficult to take up the thread of conventional chitchat when one had been buried in the heart of a nation for five years, which any sensible girl would know, and not stare, and not chatter.

"Of the Goddess of Liberty style," Max said, mentally, to himself. He was puzzled as keep up with the enemies of the meal, which was not only in courses, but served with too many olives and cut-glass accompaniments for the simple convenience of Max Belling. The variety of forks alone bewildered him. If American could only been known the cause of his vexation and obstruction, it might have saved her a deal of future trouble: she would have begun by pitying him, perhaps despising him; but Tom had led her to form an exalted conception of his friend's character, which her own extravagant imagination had completed. When poor Max was puzzling over the peculiar shape of one of his extra forks, American thought he was deep in some abstruse problem in metaphysics or mining machinery: in the mean while the fierce and disturbed gnawings she bestowed upon him were interpreted into pity and ridicule for Max, and as these two really sympathetic and congenial natures nudged each other.

Nevertheless, each dreamed of the other all night—a natural sequence to their discomfort in each other's society. To Max it took the shape of nightmare. He dreamed that he was stretched upon the rack for refusing to disclose a state secret, and that the beautiful America, attired in a decollété costume of alternate stripes of red, white, and blue, bowing, presided at the instrument of torture. He awoke to find that his leg was becoming the theatre of some posture suffering. It was sore to the touch just below the knee, and the red spot which had formed there was increasing in size. In spite of every effort to the contrary he was compelled to relinquish his desire to walk over the estate after breakfast, and to accept the ignominious alternative of a drive in America's pony phaeton. He felt bigger than the pony and heavier than the phaeton, and what with a vague uneasiness about his leg, and the presence of the lady executioner to his dream, he was in no humor to enjoy the drive. He was relieved, however, to find that American did not begin to chatter, and that she wore a quiet, sensible sort of suit buttoned to the throat, with but of some neutral color to match. Her hair was brushed back and caught in a simple knot in her neck, so that, as she drove, Max could readily admire the exquisite proportions of her head. The morning was fine and breezy, the pony, seemingly undisturbed by his extra load, trotted cheerily along, shaking his shaggy mane, and making a merry rattle with his heels on the excellently conditioned road. The village was left especially behind, and they soon entered a woodland path where, in the nude branches of the trees, premature and amatory songsters were already prospecting for nests. The moss about the old guarled roots looked fresh and green, and in a sheltered nook Max pointed out to America the first violets of the season. She threw him the reins, and as she came back to Max and gave the frail blossoms to his keeping, he began to thaw with the rest of nature, and so talk in a way that was new to America, but delightful. At first she thought he was trying to suit himself to subjects that she could understand, in the course a to to simple and natural, but she soon gave up conjecturing, and yielding herself to the enjoyment of the hour, became as natural and simple as himself. In this way they grew to understand each other before many miles had been trotted over, and Max, now fully at his ease, and with a strange sense of happiness hitherto unknown to him, even went so far as to tell her of his dream of the night before.

"I assure you, Miss Barnes," he said, "you really did give an extra screw to the torture with your own hands. I can feel it in this miserable joint of mine yet." She looked upon Max with an expression of such sweet compassion that he hastened as add: "I'm glad of the extra wrench that disabled me, for otherwise I should have been trudging over bald and boggy fields with your father and Tom, instead of exploring this exquisite bit of woodland with you."

"It is strange, but I also dreamed of you," said America, gravely.

"Oh, do! you, indeed? Well, be as frank to I was, and tell me of your dream."

"It was too ridiculous," said America; and Max saw the color creep into her clear pale cheek. To his confusion, he felt his own beginning to tingle.

"Could it have been more ridiculous than mine?" he said, gently.

"In another way," she replied. "I dreamed that you rescued me from something horrible." Here she blushed deeper, and paused.

"A dragon?" said Max, with ill concealed curiosity. And she replied that it was not a dragon; and by that time they were trotting up the avenue of poplars, and soon Max saw her disappear up the broad staircase. Tom was coming down. Max saw that he was pale and disturbed.

"I must have a talk with you," said Tom: "let's take a turn about the grounds." Then, nothing that Max limped painfully, "The devil!" he exclaimed; "that's another confounded nuisance that must be seen to to some." Then he took Max's arm, and helped him up the stairs to the guest-chamber he had slept in the night before. Tom shut and barred the door, and coming close to his friend, who had thrown himself with an air of exhaustion into an arm-chair, he said, in a tone of suppressed wrath and disappointment: "There's an hope here, Max—nothing but a budge-podge of ruin and desolation. My father is next door to a beggar."

Max bore this news with resignation. He had been thinking a bile hoping up the stairs that all that spoiled America was the natural meretricious consequence of being rich.

"I spoke as my father," continued Tom, "right after breakfast, determining to have the thing settled at once, and he confessed to me that it to mortgage hanging on by a thread so far as he is concerned—that everything is mortgaged to the hub, and the depreciation in real estate has made most of the mortgages fairly cover the property. It is only the peculiar and lucky relations that the little sharper of a Fry holds to the family that saves everything from going to the hammer. Fry holds all the mortgages, and is lenient about the interest, as well he may be. He's got some money himself, and has the handling of a quantity more through a rich old grandmother out West. When he marries Merry, this whole property will come into his hands."

"What he what?" said Max, suddenly leaping out of a sort of lethargy that had crept over him.

"When he marries America, my sister," said Tom. "Fortunately for my father he has a daughter beautiful and wise enough to keep the wolf at bay. It's a lucky thing for Merry she's not the kind of girl to bestow with poverty. She'll see to my father and Aunt Em. As for me, the pick and pan of a miner— But what in thunder—hey! Max, my boy!"

Max was walking and chattering in a congested chill; his face was livid; his nails purple. Tom got his friend to bed, and sent for a doctor at once. Max trembled out of the chill into a fever.

"Some trouble with the bone," said the doctor. "Strange about a case complication sometimes. Keep the patient quiet just now."

Which was easier recommended than done. Max tossed and trembled and talked wildly, and with an unnecessary form of patriotism, Tom thought, about America and the Goddess of Liberty.

"I'll save her, Tom," whispered Max—"I'll save her if I die for it. I do! once, you know."

"Save who, my poor Max?" said Tom.

"Why, the Goddess, you know—the Goddess of Liberty! She's turning the screws again in that accursed rack, but this don't know it. Who would have believed she could have been so supple and womanly and sweet?—so fresh and pure, balsam fir-wood, Tom, as the violets she held in her hand. I hated her by gas-light in her low dress, with all those gewgaws about her."

Tom saw that his sister's face was red and pale by turns. "Perhaps you'd better go out of the room, Merry," he said. "God only knows what fancies beset his brain." Merry thought she knew, the fancies she could tell of a certain Venetian vase that held the very violets Max raved about.

The violets in the Venetian vase were dead; others had taken their place; March ripened into April, and April was fast verging as May, and still poor Max was a prisoner in that fine luxurious upper chamber in the colonel's house at Barnesville. His leg had all this time been under treatment, and the doctor thought it possible by a series of probings and applications to effect a temporary cure. "The core of the disease will possibly remain for a longer period," said the physician, "but the fine physique of the patient will bring him round when he can get air and exercise."

Max's fine physique, however, began to be tolled against him than in his favor. The doctor leaned to the opinion that he would prefer a more sanguine temperament.

In the mean while the most of Miss American's time was spent in the vicinity of the sick-chamber. A wonderful aptitude as a nurse had developed itself in this versatile young woman, and she had soon shown a rare ability in concocting broths and dainties to tempt a jaded appetite. As usual, she devoted herself to this new hobby with enthusiasm.

"She gives her whole heart to everything she undertakes," said the colonel, apologetically, to a visitor who had called several times and found it impossible to see the daughter of the house, "but this mania will spend itself like all the rest, and then she won't want to hum of a sick person for a twelvemonth."

The colonel's ambition smiled complacently, and began to talk of other things. Although there was something unwanting as a betrothal between himself and the lady in question, his mind also was preoccupied and absorbed. An unlooked-for complication had arisen in his own affairs. His grandmother had altered her will, and left more than two-thirds of her property in a way that might occasion Mr Fry considerable trouble. He was compelled to go out and see the old lady, and had called in Bill Merry a brief farewell. Under these circumstances the young woman consented to come down. She left the hot hand of Max and his eager, devouring eyes, for the cool, clammy paws and the fond gaze of her promised husband. Merry found, as they stood together, that she really was a half head taller than Mr Fry, as Max had once laughingly said her. She looked down upon the dapper little man with gross courtesy, and left her hand in his own, but he saw that her manner was constrained and her attention wandering.

"I won't keep you from your studies, America," he said; "I'm in somewhat of a hurry myself; I must catch the noon train." Then he went on as tell her that his interests with his grandmother were seriously threatened, and his presence was necessary out there for a short period; that he would write, and he hoped the would find time to reply. America promised the would write, and began for the first time since their engagement to find it shockingly repugnant to her to have his thin lips touch her own. He was ordinarily a cold, unimpassioned wooer, and was not a whit warmer now than usual; but custom required that he should kiss her good-by. America yielded to the brief caress, but it was only when he was well out on the portico, with his hat on, and barely time to catch the train, that her manner warmed to the occasion; or the impatient crimson blazed in her cheeks. On her way back to Max's chamber she stopped in her own, and laved her face, her lips, and washed well her hands. She met the doctor in the corridor, and behind him was evidently another professional gentleman. They both walked gravely and solemnly down the stairs to the lower hall, where the colonel was pacing to and fro, his brain beneath his coat tails.

"Ahem!" coughed the colonel, sympathetically. "What is the ultimatum?"

"Just as I said," replied the family physician; "an amputation is necessary to save the patient's life, but he objects—strenuously and violently rejects."

Merry ran up the stairs without waiting to hear more, and found her brother Tom sitting by the bedside, his face buried in his hands.

"Here is your sister, Tom," said Max, with a warning inflection in his voice, and holding on his hand to the young girl with his usual cheery smile.

"You needn't try to conceal anything from me," she said. "I know all about it, I am studying medicine and surgery, and mean to be a physician. Now that the worst has come, we can meet it bravely. You'll get well and strong, and be yourself again, Max; and, after all, an old soldier surely don't mind the loss of a leg."

Then Tom, seeing a look of distress in Max's face, told Merry for the first time of the rescue of the old woman.

"If she had been young, or even pretty," groaned Tom; "but she was a certainly child—there was something uncanny in her whole appearance, and no doubt she held no infectious curse about her. Her old bones might better have been ground to powder than to have brought all this about, for she hadn't long to live in any case; but Max was always reckless."

"You'd have done the same thing," said Max, "if I had not anticipated you."

"THE WAGON CAME RAPIDLY DOWN THE STEEP CROSS STREET."

"I wish I had," cried Tom—"I wish to Heaven it was I that had to choose between my leg and my life; the leg would go mighty quick!"

"Your leg is of less consequence to you, perhaps, and your life more," said Max. "The one could be spoken to me without the other, and both are of little account. You know, Tom, that I haven't a relation or friend in the world outside of yourself."

Here Tom saw that his sister had reached the door, and was beckoning him out of the room.

"You must get upon a horse," she said, as soon as the door was closed upon the sick-chamber, "and go down to the city, and bring those doctors back with you before night. The operation must be performed at once; and tell them to get more doctors if necessary—no spare no expense. I've—I've got money of mamma's, you know, Tom," she stammered, gently—"that dear mamma left me for my own."

Tom nodded. That money of their dead mother's was bound to go in some way.

"But Max has not consented," told Tom.

"It doesn't matter," said Merry; "it must be done. He'll know nothing about it till all is over. Do you go after the doctors, and I'll see to the rest."

It seemed to Tom that the remaining hours of that day went by like a queer, awful dream. He remembered bringing the doctors stealthily in, and becoming conscious of a faint odor—sickening, sweet, overpowering—that filled the room immediately afterward, of holding his sister tight in his arms in the adjoining chamber while something terrible was going on inside there, and during an agonizing tension of his nerves, later on, hearing a terrible cry burst from the lips of poor Max.

"Gracious God!" he groaned, "whose work was this?"

"Mine!" said Merry. "Did you think I would let you die?"

It would have taken a stronger man than Max to have turned away from that beautiful, earnest, pallid face now caressingly close to his own. Tom looked on in speechless and rapt dismay, remembering his father's perilous plight.

Max remained dazed and bewildered, but after that first outcry made no complaint. The operation was eminently successful. The doctors rubbed their hands over it, and eulogized the system, the patient, each other, everything and everybody concerned. A speedy convalescence and radical riddance of the whole disorder was prophesied. But days went by—weeks—a month and more, and still Max lay under the silken canopy, his face as waxen and weak veined as that of a sick infant, his eyes unnaturally bright and hollow, his hands feverish, and his whole aspect fit to strike terror to the hearts that remained steadfastly but despairingly fond.

"Life is sweet, Tom," Max told one day. "I never thought it could hold so much of happiness; but you see, I can't, I must not live—it would be too cowardly; there's no other way out of it but to die. Would you see your incomparable sister tied for life to a pauper and a cripple—the wife of a one-legged flag-man at a railway crossing, or accompanying his efforts with a hoarse gurdy upon a tambourine? Then remember the desperate condition of your father. My good Tom, it is a hopeless case."

It was a long speech for poor Max. Great beads started out on his forehead, and his voice had sunk to a whisper before he was half through with it. But it told the whole story.

"We might take Merry's money into consideration," said Tom, then paused, remembering the insufficient quantity there was to take. Tom plunged his hands despair into his hair, and wished there was a bank somewhere adjacent, and he one an A 1 tip-top burglar with an elastic conscience. He felt positive that only a few thousand dollars would develop the nerve to such an extent that another leg would be a superfluity to Max.

One magnificent morning in June, Nature was at her happiest, at her best. The long windows of Max's chamber were opened to the full; the branches of the sycamores tempered the rays of the sun and subdued the frolic of the breeze. A celestial silence reigned in the garden below, where the tulips blazed, the pinks exhaled spicy odors, still parterres of blossoms were made manna by bees and butterflies, and pale phantoms of sunbeams were robed and reflected to a prodigality of reflected color and shade; the birds sang, the bees hummed, all in an under-tone of dreamy delight. But the pale lips of Max broke into an old rhyme that somehow but marred the voluptuous ease of the moment:

"Oh, to think my name is crossed
From duty's master-spell—
That I may slumber through the clarion call,
And live the joy of an embodied soul,
Free as a disrobed ghost!
Oh, to feel a life of deed
Was emptied out in deed
That fire of pain that burned so brief a while—
That fire from which I come as the dead come Forth from the irreparable tomb!"

Two human beings in the next room looked at each other in speechless dismay. Tom shook his head, and let it fall, with a gesture of despair, upon his hand again; and Merry, to control her nerves, picked up a paper that had lain upon the table since the previous day. A sealed letter, addressed by the same hand, had remained there even longer. They were both from the Western town where Mr. Fry was still sojourning. His grandmother had died in the interim, which palliative calamity threatened further complications and a longer delay. Merry opened the paper, and read it with her eyes alone, the nerve that connected the organ of vision with her brain was dormant and paralyzed. The advertisements, being in larger print, she read first. Presently her eyes fell upon the following:

"If the tall, brown-a blackered gentleman who, on the evening of the 19th of March, near the depot at ——, rescued an old lady from being run over, and immediately afterward, with his companion, took the train eastward, will communicate with H. K. Fry, solicitor, he will hear of something greatly to his advantage."

Merry read this over several times, sometimes repeating the words half aloud to get their meaning, her eyes gradually gaining intelligence and expression. Then she turned to the neglected letter and broke the seal. Her hands trembled, and her lips parted eagerly. Slie drifted over the letter till she reached the following passage: "And this, dear American, is the story the absurd old lady told: that while crossing the street she stumbled, and a wagon rattling down the hill would have inevitably gone over her had it not been for this tall deliverer, who seized her in his arms and carried her to the corner; that he was himself struck by the pole of the wagon, but, apparently unhurt, took the eastward train. And in this mythical knight," added Mr. Fry, "my grandmother has left one half her money and her share in the mine. The money alone will amount to sixty thousand dollars. But I doubt if he can be found very soon, and in the mean while I am the executor and administrator of the estate."

Merry's eyes had dilated to an enormous extent; a crimson flame burned in her cheek. The letter and newspaper she clinched in her hand, and striding over to Tom, touched him upon the shoulder. Tom looked up, and was startled to find the magnificent face glowing down upon him. Merry thrust the paper into her hand, and pointed to the solicitor's advertisement. Tom read, and the paper began to rattle in his fingers. Then Merry pushed the open letter upon the paper, and pointed to the interesting paragraph. Tom read, and his face grew pale as ashes. He slowly arose to his feet, to the ends of his toes, and lifting the letter above his head, went pirouetting around the room, singing in an effective undertone this touching refrain:

"I got broke at playing poker,
Three of a kind!"

This powerful tonic had to be administered to Max in small doses; but we must refer the reader for the sequel to the story to an issue of the Barnesville Chronicle some months later on. It was a lengthy list of eligibles, but the gist of it remained in the information that the bridal excursion of the happy pair—which was to be rather a barren diversion for a convalescent, however—included a suggestive visit to a prosperous mine, and that the sole party who accompanied them was "our esteemed fellow-townsman Thomas Jefferson Barnes, Esq., the brother of the bride."

"WHOSE WORK WAS THIS?"

TWEDDLE HALL, ALBANY.

Those of our readers who are familiar with the State Capital will remember the plain but commodious "brown-stone" building which for nearly a quarter of a century stood on the corner of Pearl and State streets, half way up the steep hill the brow of which is crowned by the Capitol. The site of the building is famous in the annals of the city. There, until 1832, stood the "White House," the parsonage of BALTHAZAR LEDEUX, whose name was borne by one of the principal streets of Albany until in a moment of weakness and ambition the city authorities committed the folly of substituting that of "Madison Avenue." The parsonage was built of white brick, brought from Holland along with the bell and pulpit. After the building was abandoned as a parsonage it was occupied by the publishers GEORGE and CHARLES R. WEBSTER, who went out from it to the limits, not then very extended, of the Union the "Webster's Spelling Book," which until very lately held its own in many a school of the State. There also was printed the old Albany Gazette, a noted journal in its day. The building was shaded by the "Old Elm Tree," the chief of those which made Pearl Street on a midsummer day, before the march of improvement had widened it, one of the most charming of the winding streets of Albany. The old tree on the corner stood till 1877, and when it was cut up into relics for the reverent Albanians it was found that several inches in thickness of its trunk was thickly studded with tacks, it having been in former times the favorite place for posting all sorts of public notices.

Tweddle Hall was built in 1800, and was at that time and for a long while after the only decent assembly room in the State capital. It was the scene of many a notable gathering and entertainment. Its acoustic properties were peculiarly good, and it was a favorite house with singers, some of the most celebrated of whom have been heard within its walls. It was in Tweddle Hall, on the 31st of January, 1861, that the famous Democratic Convention was called to consider the then troubled condition of the country, and at which many words were spoken which their authors would afterward have given much to be able to withdraw. Everything was in confusion. Men's minds were excited not only by alarm for the existence of the government, but by partisan disappointment and disgust at the overthrow of the powerful party which had so long swayed the destinies of the government. Governor SEYMOUR, Judge CULVER, Mr. TILDEN, then Lyman J. TRUMBULL, and James S. THAYER were the ruling spirits of the Convention. Mr. SEYMOUR there delivered the first of that long series of characteristic speeches which made him one of the most conspicuous and most unfortunate men of his time. He likened the Republicans to maniacs at the helm of the ship of state, and while beseeching his hearers to lay aside all party feeling, insulted and maligned the statesmen into whose hands the government was passing with the most cruel insinuations. Mr. THAYER went further. "If a revolution is to begin, it shall be inaugurated at home," he vociferated, and if "coercion" were to be attempted, he threatened the Republican leaders with the "guillotine." Mr. TURNAHAN's language was scarcely more moderate, but it must be said of him that the actual rebellion found him among the most energetic and influential of the supporters of the national government.

At this Convention the venerable Chancellor WALWORTH was brought upon the stage to lift his feeble voice in deprecation of the horrors of civil war, and he drew a pathetic picture of the fate which he dreaded for the country should the government undertake to put down resistance to the laws by force. The Convention adopted a long series of resolutions, the most significant of which was "that the surest and most ineffective argument that can be addressed by the Confederacy" (that was then the Democratic name for the United States), "or its adhering members, by the seceding States, is civil war. Civil war will restore the Union, but will defeat forever its reconstruction." Delegates were named to a Peace Convention, which never met. The mischief done by the Convention was very great. It was one of the principal pretexts on which the South relied that secession could be peacefully accomplished, and that the use of force by the President would make the flame of insurrection in the North. Its records read like very ancient history. Most of the men who took part in it are dead, or sunk in an obscurity as impenetrable as that of death

Of more recent conventions held in Tweddle Hall the one most likely to be remembered in political circles was that of 1877, when the first heavy blow was dealt to Mr Tilden's fortunes in the house of his friends, and the combination was formed in New York State which robbed him of the coveted nomination in 1880. Of the political meetings held there, one was made memorable by a speech from Governor Morton, of Indiana. It was at the darkest period of the war. The hall had been partly packed with men sent to break up the meeting. As Mr Morton, then in the prime of his powers, was advocating the most energetic measures, one of the disturbers called to him, "Would you arm the niggers?" "I would fight the rebels with lyncnes!" thundered the speaker, in a voice which rose above the tumult and silenced it.

Tweddle Hall was burned to the ground on the morning of the 10th inst. In point of safety in case of fire it was a notorious defective. A delay of five minutes in giving the alarm enabled the flames to get beyond control, and had the auditorium been filled, the tragedy of the Brooklyn Theatre must have been repeated.

THE SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

The elections to fill the places of twenty-six United States Senators whose terms expire on March 4 have been of unusual interest, and in a few cases have been closely contested. In a majority of instances, however, the present holders have been returned to their seats for another six years. Of the six Senators-elect whose portraits are given on page 61, four, Messrs. Colquitt, Gibson, Wilson, and Cullom, are new men, and two, Messrs. Hamlin and Hoar, are in the present Senate.

Ex-Governor Alfred H. Colquitt, of Georgia, who succeeds Mr Pope Barrow, the temporary occupant of the late Mr Hill's seat, has made a good record in his State, but is altogether inexperienced in Congressional service. Randall Lee Gibson, of Louisiana, the successor of Mr William Pitt Kellogg, on the other hand, has served four terms in the House of Representatives. He goes to the Senate by the unanimous vote of the General Assembly of his State. Mr. Gibson is a Kentuckian by birth, and is fifty years of age. He served in the Confederate army throughout the war. The Senator from Iowa, Mr James F. Wilson, is an old hand in Congressional matters, having served in the House during the Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, and Fortieth sessions. He was one of the managers of the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson. He is fifty-four years of age, and was born in Newark, Ohio. Mr. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, who resigns the honors of the Governor's chair for those of the Senate, can also lay claim to considerable experience in the national legislature. He was a member of the Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, and Forty-first Congresses, and served on various important committees. He is a Kentuckian by birth, and about fifty-four years of age.

Messrs. Harris, of Tennessee, and Hoar, of Massachusetts, are their own successors. Mr. Isham G. Harris was born in Tennessee, was a Representative in Congress from that State from 1849 to 1853, a Presidential elector in 1856, and Governor from 1857 to 1861. He took part in the rebellion, and in 1867 resumed the practice of law at Memphis. In 1877 he was sent to the United States Senate. Mr Hoar, of Massachusetts, has served his State in many important positions. He was a Representative in the Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-third, and Forty-fourth Congresses, but declined a renomination for the Forty-fifth. Mr Hoar was an Overseer of Harvard College from 1874 to 1880, presided over the Massachusetts State Republican Conventions of 1871 and 1877, was a delegate to the Republican National Convention of 1876 at Cincinnati, one of the managers of the Belknap impeachment trial in 1876, a member of the Electoral Commission in the same year, and President of the Republican National Convention at Chicago in 1880. He is in his fifty-seventh year.

Home and Foreign Critics

Unite in according to HARPER'S CHRISTMAS unqualified praise. Says the New York Sun: A monument of beauty.

Hartford Courant: A superb production.

N. Y. Mail and Express: Supreme among the periodicals of the world.

Lotterville Courier-Journal: The crowning Christmas paper of the world.

Brooklyn Times: The finest publication of its kind ever issued in Europe or America.

Christian Advocate, N. Y.: The finest and most artistic Christmas paper ever published.

New York Tribune: It would be difficult to select any part of the work for special commendation when everything is so good.

New York Times: The pictures are every one capital, and thoroughly worthy of the high reputations of the artists who made them.

St James's Gazette, London: Few Albums de luxe are more magnificently printed, or more beautifully illustrated, or more sumptuous in every way.

The Critic, N. Y.: Criticism stands disarmed before this beautiful publication. From the first page to the last it is a delight to the eye and to the mind.

Boston Traveller: A triumph of art; a treasury of literary riches, a marvel of beauty, but certainly no more charming holiday publication of the sort has ever been born.

Saturday Review, London: HARPER'S CHRISTMAS is in every respect worthy of the rank which the Magazine has attained, not only among Americans, but among English periodicals.

Literary World, London: It keeps up the American reputation for producing "big things." This Christmas number is not only the biggest but the best thing that we have seen in connection with illustrated weekly papers.

Academy, London: We have heard a great deal in advance about HARPER'S CHRISTMAS, but we must confess that the reality surpasses the announcement. Whether as regard the illustrations or the letter-press, nothing so good of the kind has yet been produced in England.

A "STALWART" VICTORY.

THE retention of the rotten borough system of delegate representation in the National Convention is called a Stalwart triumph, and certainly it has the mark of such triumphs in its total want of apprehension of the actual political situation. The two conspicuous Stalwart performances in this State within the last two years are the attempted CONKLING-PLATT re-election in 1881 and the State nominations in 1882. They were both characteristic of that Bourbon dullness in politics which is called Stalwartism. This is the spirit which disbelieves in popular intelligence, sneers at political honesty as sentimentality, and holds lying and cheating in public affairs to be evidence of "virility." It is touching to see the innocent Stalwart faith which thought the Whiskey Ring frauds were disproved by calling the charges "mud slinging" and which complacently sneers at the purpose of the country to break up nefarious practices in politics as snivel service reform. Indeed, this last phrase has imparted as much consolation to despondent Stalwarts as the term "Woolly Heads" applied to Republicans twenty-five years ago gave to Hunker Democrats and Silver Gray Whigs. But Republicanism prevailed.

The Stalwart victory in the National Committee consists substantially in the decision that representation in the Convention shall be based upon population and not upon party strength. The result of this decision is to make a real expression of the party preference more difficult and to make bargains easier. This is undoubtedly, as far as it goes, a characteristic Stalwart victory. But, on the other hand, the elections are to be actually district elections—an arrangement which makes the manipulation of State bosses more difficult. It would not be easy for the most candid Stalwart to show why the delegation to a National Republican Convention should not represent the real Republican strength of the country, equalized as nearly as practicable. This should be the object of every plan in regard to a Convention, because the action of the Convention loses moral weight just in the degree that it is felt not to represent the actual sentiment of the party. The fatal argument against the old method of nomination by a Congressional caucus was the evident opportunity offered by it of bargaining between members of Congress and the candidates, especially if the President were one of them. It was but natural, therefore, that in 1824, when the contest was wholly personal, the caucus nomination carried no authority. Whatever tends to disturb general confidence in the action of the nominating body is very injurious to the party, and such disturbance is inevitably produced by any scheme which favors illegitimate control of the Convention, and it is therefore a very barren victory to persuade the National Committee to approve such a scheme.

So far as this point is concerned, what is called the Stalwart victory merely makes party success more difficult in 1884. But it also increases that difficulty in another way. Mr. CHANDLER is reported to have said at the meeting of the committee that defeat awaited the party if the representation were not reformed. We doubt whether Mr. CHANDLER allowed himself to make any such admission. But the refusal to reform is an unfavorable augury of success because it shows an unwillingness to read wisely the signs of the times. It is certainly very desirable, if not indispensable to Republican success in 1884, that the party should be conformed to the evident changes in public sentiment, and that it be plainly the best representative of the best opinion of the country. Now the palpable predominance in its councils of the spirit and the leadership that were discarded in the Convention of 1880 could hardly be an earnest of victory in view of the state of political feeling disclosed by the last elections. The action of Congress in the prompt passage of the reform bill was a much greater Republican advantage than some of its supporters probably supposed. It showed a thorough sense of the situation. But the conduct of the committee is discordant with that of Congress, and defies a clearly expressed public opinion. The vote which was so independent at the election was largely a Republican vote. Now a second adverse vote is always easier than the first, and that protesting vote of 1882 will not be recovered merely by practically announcing that the party sees no reason to change its methods and its management. Such victory as was won by Stalwartism in the committee was, therefore, as we have said, a characteristic Stalwart victory because it tends to injure the party. The one thing which, since the election, is a hopeful evidence of Republican vigor is the passage of the reform bill. But while we gladly acknowledge the efficient aid that it received from certain gentlemen known as Stalwarts, it will not be claimed as in any sense a Stalwart measure, but, on the contrary, it is known to be repugnant to Stalwart sentiment. Indeed, the history of two years shows pretty plainly that if Republican dominance be desirable, Stalwart victories are not to be prayed for.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS DECISION

THE Supreme Court has pronounced the conspiracy clause of the Ku-Klux law, section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, to be unconstitutional. At the time of its passage it was held to be authorized by the Fourteenth Amendment, which lays certain restriction upon State action. The substance of the decision is that under that amendment the United States can protect the civil rights of individuals only when violated by State authority. But for a simple conspiracy against such rights the remedy must be sought under State law.

The sound opinion of the Court, which commends itself to every intelligent mind, shows the groundlessness of the fear expressed by ex-Governor SEYMOUR in his late article in the North American Review, that there is a dangerous centralizing tendency in the government. The loose, vague, and perilous Jeffersonian-Virginia-and-Kentucky-resolution theory of the Union has been happily discredited by the war. Of that theory CALHOUN was the logical advocate in asserting the superior sovereignty of the States. But the declaration of the true doctrine of national supremacy, with distinctly defined State authority, is one of the great traditions of the Supreme Court, and its present decision is in strict accordance with it.

The long and terrible civil war sprang from the dogma of State sovereignty invoked to protect and perpetuate slavery. It was natural that at its close the tendency to magnify the national authority should have been very strong, and especially to defend the victims of slavery. That tendency was in every way preferable to the disposition to connive at the crimes of the old slavery spirit under the same old plea of State sovereignty. In a calmer time the laws passed under that humane impulse are reviewed, and when found to be incompatible with strict constitutional authority, they are set aside. It is another illustration of the singular wisdom of our constitutional system.

A DISGRACEFUL TAX.

THE grotesque difficulties and injustice of the tariff appear in many ways, and there are two or three illustrations which have been recently reported that deserve attention. Attempts have been often made to tax American invalids who use the mineral waters of Europe. But Congress drew the line of protection at that point, and declined to levy a tax upon the efforts of the sick to get well. Congress, however, could not outwit the indefatigable ingenuity of the owners of American mineral springs, who obtained a ruling from the Secretary of the Treasury that the bottles and jugs in which the European water was imported must pay a tax of about thirty per cent., although the jugs and bottles are useless for any other purpose. Emboldened by success, the same interest has now pushed on, and proposes to change the duty to one and a half cents per pound, which would quadruple the tax, and make it about one hundred and twenty per cent.

But a tax even more grotesque is that upon pictures and statues. The dream of every poor American boy who feels the instinct of the artist stirring within him is to save and save until, by the most careful self-denial and economy, he can lay by money enough to carry him over the ocean to see and study the great works of the great masters of his art. Every lover of art feels that the most serious impediment for the art student in this country is the want of what he calls an atmosphere of art, which is only to be found where there are works which at once educate the taste of the community and inspire and teach the young artist to gratify it. A more whimsical and barbarous device in a civilized and actively developing nation can hardly be conceived than a prohibition of the means by which such taste is to be fostered and such talent encouraged. Such a prohibition is a proscription of genius. It is saying to RAPHAEL and MICHAEL ANGELO, to TITIAN and TURNER, to the refining and humanizing influences of beauty and grace as revealed in all historic and contemporaneous art, that they are not welcome to America, and shall be treated as invaders and enemies. A consequence of this foolish exclusion is well shown by Mr. F. D. MILLET in a recent letter. An exhibition of the pictures of one of the most distinguished living English artists, ALMA TADEMA, is proposed in London. Some of the most important of his pictures are owned in this country. The owners are willing to loan the pictures for the exhibition, provided that they are guaranteed against payment of the duty upon them when they are returned. But the Secretary of the Treasury declares the law to be explicit, and upon the present value of the pictures, which the customs appraisers may determine, the return duty would be much greater than the original.

Could anything be more ludicrous and more shameful for a generous and civilized nation? Mr. TADEMA is to be denied the advantage of exhibiting his pictures owned in this country because his greater fame makes those pictures more valuable, and the reason alleged is that if good pictures by foreign artists are permitted to come into the country, the production of good pictures in America will be checked. Does the introduction of beautiful foreign shrubs and plants ruin the American florist? Was the Parthenon built or the "Last Judgment" painted by promoting ignorance of the great achievements of art, and abutting up Athens and Rome to a stifling provinciality? American artists are wiser than American legislators, and the Society of American Artists has recently passed a resolution which Congress, in revising the tariff, may well heed:

"Resolved, That the attention of the present Tariff Commission and of Congress should be called to the fact that whereas the United States of America is the only leading nation in the world that has not inherited the works of art of any great epoch of the past, it is at the same time the only nation that puts a penalty, by means of a tariff, upon the importation of works of art, both ancient and modern, and that in the opinion of this society all works of art should be excepted from the payment of duties, both in the interest of art in general and of American art in particular."

THE LOSS OF THE "CIMBRIA."

OUR remark of last week that improvement in the means of saving human life does not keep pace with all other improvement is sadly verified by the terrible catastrophe of the Cimbria, the Hamburg steamer which was run down by the steamship Sultan on Friday, January 19, on the way from Hamburg to Havre, sinking within a quarter of an hour, with a loss of nearly four hundred passengers. This is one of the great disasters upon the sea which no care or skill seems to be able to avert. Maritime signals, water proof compartments, every life preserving device, often become futile in the terrible hour, and the ocean remorselessly asserts its supremacy over the utmost human ingenuity.

There are certain kinds of catastrophe, however, which seem to be avoidable at sea, and among these may be included such a collision as that of the Sultan with the Cimbria. There was a dense fog; signal-whistles were heard; a ship is suddenly seen one hundred and fifty feet off; there is a crash, and almost immediately the vessel that is struck heels over and sinks. So far as now appears, officers and crew and passengers behaved well, and nothing that science has devised for safety was wanting. But there was not a storm. Both vessels were entirely manageable, and it would seem that if both had been merely holding their headway, so fatal a crash need not have occurred. The most baffling enemy of the seaman is fog. It destroys the possibility of seeing, and it is now said that it also paralyzes sound. The only reasonable course to pursue is to move as slowly as possible. But the accounts of the sailing of vessels in fogs show generally that they either dash on at full speed or proceed at half speed. In the crowded bay and harbor of New York, when serious collisions occur, it is because vessels are doing more than merely keeping their headway. When the Staten Island ferry boat Castleton was run down by the sea steamer Spain a few years ago, the Spain was moving out of the harbor, not perhaps at full speed, but with the consciousness of superior force to any craft that she was likely to encounter.

There is no easy method of enforcing a rule regulating speed during a fog. The management of vessels under such circumstances depends very much upon the temperament of the commander. An adventurous and bold captain naturally takes risks and runs for luck, depending upon the momentum of his vessel and the chapter of chances. The prudent captain holds his cautious way, and in the midst is overtaken and run down. The perils of the sea are very little diminished. Iron hulls, and collision bulkheads, and Atlantic voyages of a week, and every comfort and luxury of accommodation and entertainment, alleviate somewhat the discomforts, but they do not obviate the dangers, of a sea-voyage. But the great number and variety of disasters by sea and land which have marked this winter will certainly emphasize the fact that running for luck is not the conduct of wise men or of a sensible community.

BULLION CERTIFICATES.

Mr. J. W. SYLVESTER, of the Assay Office, has issued a little pamphlet making a simple and valuable practical suggestion for a safe currency. The actual use of coin in business transactions is as small as to be computed at only five per cent. of the whole amount. Mr. SYLVESTER proposes that the bulk of bullion be manufactured into fine bars, with the weight and fineness stamped upon them, and that such bars of a defined fineness be made legal tender for their stamped value.

The government is to keep the bars on deposit, issuing for them certificates of deposit redeemable upon presentation. The certificates, of any fractional value, secured by bullion actually upon deposit and always ready to be delivered, would be the equivalent of gold, and circulate as bank-notes or legal tenders, and for convenience would be greatly preferable to coin. Mr. SYLVESTER estimates that nine-tenths of the present coinage would be dispensed with, as the only need of coin would be to supply the occasional demand of holders of small certificates.

The application of this scheme to silver bullion is more difficult. Mr. SYLVESTER thinks that silver bars might be treated in the same manner, and made legal tender at the market value of silver calculated in gold. This relative value he would have authoritatively determined each business day in the year, and that determination should fix the relative legal value for the next business day. This is more uncertain. But the uncertainty is inevitable in the attempt to deal with a double standard. Mr. SYLVESTER'S proposition in regard to gold bullion is certainly admirably simple and feasible.

LIEBER'S LETTERS.

THE massive head and the serious, half-melancholy face of the portrait in the Life and Letters of Francis Lieber vividly recall that earnest, thoughtful, and learned man. The book itself, edited by Professor PERRY, is a delightful contribution to our literature, for the freedom and familiarity of LIEBER'S letters, and the shrewdness of his perceptions, made him one of the most charming of correspondents. Neither time nor fate could affect the simplicity, enthusiasm, and tenderness of his nature. Age did not wither him, nor custom stale the generous impulse which led the boy of fifteen joyfully to Waterloo and Greece.

Those who saw the grave elderly professor could not readily believe that his young life had been singularly romantic. He grew up with the young ferment of the earlier part of the century, with which hatred of NAPOLEON was a kind of religion, and among the noble labors of his life none was nobler than that of founding political liberty upon a moral basis, and expounding the moral sanctions of law. From 1835 to 1857 LIEBER filled the chair of history in the University of South Carolina, at Columbia. It was a long and sad exile for him. His friends were all elsewhere, and he had no sympathy with the life, the opinions, and the tendencies of the society around him.

The sense of isolation, however, gave him all the consciousness for his real work, the preparation of his treatises upon political science, which are the most important that have appeared in this country. His ardent and ethusiastic nature also constantly overflowed into letters, which are a most interesting series of comments upon the quarter of a century preceding the civil war, by a man of foreign birth, but of the truest American sympathies and of a strong mental grasp, living unwillingly in the very heart of the secession movement. When the war came, his great knowledge and experience made him a most useful counsellor of the government, as the book shows. With admirable judgment Professor PERRY has so skilfully disposed the letters that they tell the story of the life, and make an autobiography so singularly interesting that all who knew Dr. LIEBER personally will rejoice to know that the illustration will be now confirmed by a more general public appreciation.

THE GREEK LEXICON.

THE seventh edition of the Greek-English Lexicon of LIDDELL and SCOTT, just issued by the HARPERS, is a noble work. It has been revised and augmented throughout with large additions, and in this work the editors have had the great advantage of the co-operation of the most accomplished American scholars, of which they make honorable mention: "We have gratefully to acknowledge the assistance rendered us by many scholars. More particularly must we mention the names of Professors DRISLER, of New York, GOODWIN, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and GILDERSLEEVE, of Baltimore. Professors GOODWIN and GILDERSLEEVE have contributed several important articles, which their well-known grammatical learning makes peculiarly valuable; we may specify the articles on ἄν, εἰ, εἰθε, εἴτε, ἐάν, ἐπεί, ἐπειδή, ἐπειδάν, εὖτε, ἕως, ἕως ἄν, ὅταν, ὅτε, ὅτι, and πρίν: the former has also supplied some excellent additions to Attic law terms, such as παραστάς, παραγραφή, συκοφάντης, τέλος, ἐπώνυμος. Professor DRISLER has gone carefully over the whole book, and there is hardly a page which does not bear some trace of his accurate observation." The work, which is invaluable to every student of Greek, is finely printed, and is in bound in the most convenient style.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CLERGY.

AT the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League last summer three addresses were authorized—one to the voters of the United States, one to the clergy of all denominations, and one to the friends of education and the authorities of schools and colleges. The first address was issued just before the election in November, the second has been just issued, and the third is in preparation. The address to the clergy is signed by the Hon. JOHN JAY, chairman; and by Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., of Boston; the Right Rev. STEPHEN V. RYAN, of Buffalo; the Rev. SAMUEL J. NICOLLS, D.D., of St. Louis; the Rev. J. ANDREWS HARRIS, D.D., of Philadelphia; and the Rev. J. M. BUCKLEY, D.D., of New York.

The names and the standing of these gentlemen will illustrate the extent of the interest in the subject, and the character of those who are interested. The question is not one of party, but of political morality, to which none more than the clergy would be naturally attracted, and the address just issued calls especial attention to a branch of the subject which hitherto has not been made prominent—the effect of the spoils system of appointment upon the treatment and welfare of the most helpless class in the community—the recipients of public charity. The clearly defined facts and the cogent reasoning of the address upon this point will arouse renewed interest in one of the simplest and most beneficent of reform movements.

The address is brief, and is to be obtained for circulation, at the most moderate price, at the office of the League, No. 4 Pine Street, New York.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A VETERAN.

THE venerable JAMES WATSON WEBB, ex-Minister to Brazil, and long the editor of the old Courier and Enquirer, who will complete his eighty-first year on the 8th of February, writes cheerfully to the Times to correct a statement of his greater age, and adds some striking reminiscences.

In 1819 Mr. WEBB was a young lieutenant of artillery, and he says:

"I was stationed at Detroit when its population was only 2000, it is now upward of 150,000. I was stationed at St. Louis when its population was 23,000; it now exceeds 550,000. I was stationed at Chicago ten years before the first house was erected, and its present population exceeds 600,000. When I first passed through Buffalo, in 1819, it contained some fifty houses, and it now boasts a population of nearly 300,000. At that time the shipping of Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan consisted of one steamer, the Walk in the Water, lying high and dry as the shore east Buffalo, three small schooners, the Decatur, the Jackson, and the ——, and one hermaphrodite brig belonging to Canada."

As adjutant of the Third Regiment, Mr. WEBB passed up the Fox River and down the Wisconsin:

"Now all Wisconsin and the west bank of the Mississippi are well-settled flourishing States. And all this during the active period of a single life. Then all the region of which I write was a military wilderness, occupied by the Indian only and the game upon which he lived. Now it boasts a population of nearly twenty millions of intelligent, enterprising, and prosperous freemen."

REVOLUTIONARY MONUMENTS.

THE close of the Revolutionary centennial season is a fitting time for the passage of the Revolutionary monument bill by Congress. We have more than once called attention to the measure, and the completion of the monument on the Saratoga battle-field, the monument for the memorial at Valley Forge, and the impending celebration at Newburgh, which will close the series of commemorations, naturally renew public interest in the subject.

The bill before Congress provides that whenever any incorporated State association shall have begun to raise money to erect a memorial upon a Revolutionary battle-field, it shall be entitled to receive one dollar from the public Treasury for every dollar raised by its own efforts, within a limit to be specified. There are proper safeguards provided against unauthorized payments on foolish undertakings, and thus the chief objection that might be offered is readily removed.

Such a bill is its own argument. When jobbery has been prevented, every old State, and every new State sprung from the old, will naturally favor its passage. In an era swift national life whatever recalls with honor the great deeds and the great men that helped to make us a nation is a priceless benefit. The proposition of the bill concerns, of course, a sentiment, but patriotism and love, the strongest social and moral forces, are no issues. Grants for such memorials will not return in dividends of money. They are like appropriations for lage and salmes. But the reason and the merits of the bill are so obvious that, could it once be brought to a vote, it is not doubtful that it would pass. New York is one of the original States interested, and we are sure the Senators and Representatives would gladly support a well-considered bill.

PERSONAL.

HUGO MASS, the anarchist, was cast to jail in London for expressing his delight at the murder of the Czar, but was very generally ignored in Chicago for exhorting the inhabitants of that city to "kill every one now ruling over the people." The Pall Mall Gazette thereupon takes occasion to notice "the sheer tolerance of the Americans."

—Professor FELIX ADLER assures the Society for Ethical Culture that "the bond that attracts man to woman always begins with admiration. As the Brooklyn Bridge grew from its first wire, so love springs from admiration. Women acknowledge the difference, but not the inferiority, of their sex, by their admiration for masculine strength; and unless a man has some strength, mentally or physically, he can never attract any but silly misses."

—The late Bishop WILBERFORCE'S diary contains the following: "It is hard to convince a person like the Archbishop of York that you do not agree with him—(1) because his self-importance makes him almost unable to apprehend such a possibility; (2) because it leads him as perpetually to repeat his own assertions that it is not easy, without a seeming breach of courtesy, to force in the mention of your own opinions."

—On his fifty-fourth birthday the TICHBORNE claimant, still in Portsea Prison, was allowed to receive a visit from his two sons. He showed them "a first-class conduct badge" which he wears for good behavior.

—The reading of DANTE, says Mr. GLADSTONE, "is not merely a pleasure, a beau de fièvre, or a lesson; it is a vigorous discipline for the heart, the intellect, the whole man. In the school of DANTE I have learned a great part of that mental provision (however insufficient it may be) which has served me to make the journey of human life up to the term of nearly seventy-three years."

—A correspondent of the Lancet writes: "There is just now a demand for highly educated young women for work requiring all those qualities of mind which doctors' girls may be supposed very often to inherit, being such as tend to the success of medical men, viz., an interest in anatomy, a quickness to note the movements and appearance of the body, and a desire to relieve the suffering of their fellow creatures." He refers to the work of teaching the deaf and so-called dumb to communicate by the oral or German method. There is a college in England where this method is taught. The number of deaf and so-called dumb persons in the United Kingdom is about the same as the number of "qualified medical men."

—JOHN BRIGHT'S sister, Mrs MARGARET E. LUCAS, said at a temperance meeting that women are the greatest sufferers by drink, and the hardest to convince as to the necessity of total abstinence.

—Punch thinks that at the present festive season even paupers might be permitted to enjoy the festivities of music and dancing, and suggests as any benevolent board of guardians the idea of a workhouse ball to least once a year. "Sets of workhouse quadrilles and workhouse waltzes might be composed expressly for such entertainments, and the doctor's music might include a Minuet de la Maison d'Industrie. It might do the hearts of some of the parishioners good to attend a bona fide charity ball."

—Mr. W. W. ASTOR, our Minister to Rome, has organized in that city an American club, with reading, card, dress, billiard, and conversation rooms.

—PATTI is said to receive $4000 every night she sings, and NILSSON $2500.

—The distinguished octogenarian surgeon, Dr. WILLARD PARKER, has been seriously ill from a cold.

—While on his trip to Charleston, the Marquis of Lorne had a difficulty with the railroad authorities, who wanted to charge him $300 for towing his two special cars from Richmond to that city. Having explained that he did not propose to be gouged, the Marquis bought tickets for all the seats in a PULLMAN car, transferred his baggage and the Princess Louise's "things" to it, and proceeded on his journey, leaving the special cars behind.

—In his newest poem, Mr. SWINBURNE announces that love is "the loveliest and lordliest born of things."

—Dr. W. ROBERTSON SMITH'S professorship in Cambridge is a non-resident one. His chair is that of Arabic.

—The many friends and admirers of the Rev. Dr. WILLIAM H. MILBURN in and about New York will be pleased to learn that the distinguished lecturer contemplates giving during Lent a popular course in Chickering Hall. His subject will be, "The Great Orators, from Demosthenes to Webster and Clay." These lectures are historical and picturesque rather than critical and technical, and will prove a genuine treat to those who hear them. The first will be delivered on Thursday, February 14, at eleven in the morning, and the others on the Mondays and Thursdays following. The success of the previous morning course, given in the same hall last spring, on "The Great Poets," was very marked, and judging from the rapid sale of tickets for the Lenten lectures, they will be received with equal favor.

—The Boston Advertiser, while admitting that "the rest of the country has been making fun" of Bostonians on account of their partiality for baked beans, finds comfort in the thought that the Bostonians have been forcing all creation to eat their dish as their prize.

—An English editor expresses his amazement that an unmarried lady should expatiate to married ladies on such a subject as "How to Wash a Baby." Such was the case, though. Thirty women listened the other night, in the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, to Miss MARY HOWARD'S hints on baby-washing, which were illustrated with a live specimen lent for the occasion by a young mother in the audience.

—Women are to be employed as clerks in the French post-offices, beginning their operations as the Money-order Department. They know how to give orders about money.

—ROSTAT, BAPTIN LEPAGE, and ANTOINE PROUST were successful in making sketches of the dead GAMBETTA in Ville d'Avray, but MAINCENTIN came many without having accomplished his purpose.

—Advertisement in the London Queen: "Address wanted of a lady who will contribute my initials on my own linen. F. L. C., Tunard, Kennel Wood, Chislehurst."

—The King of Portugal has had his town residence connected with the Lisbon Telephone Exchange, and is said to be the first monarch to enjoy such a thing.

—ARAMI PASHA'S wife did not accompany him in his exile to Ceylon. She is living in the Rue de Rivoli, Paris, where she is known as Madame ARAMI. Although dressing in European costume, she is Orientally veiled when on the streets.

—Mr. EDMUND YATES observes: "I do not think that artists should be too literary. Therefore I decline to find fault with the many grammar with which Mr. MILLAIS has just lauded JOHN LEECH. 'Few of we painters will have such good and valuable work as he has left.' Let the worst of pronouns and their cases be left to we journalists; they need not oppress the mind of he who painted the grand old man so grandly."

—The majority of French journalists, writes the Paris correspondent of the London World, have strange ideas of dignity and self-respect. Scandal—that is their great resource. A Parisian celebrity is reported to be ill, for instance. Straightway a dozen reporters besiege his door and insist on having information. If he has the intruders turned out, they go and publish some horrible calumny on him. The accident to Mr. GRANVILLE is a case in point.

—M. COQUELIN, the celebrated actor of the Comédie Française, will receive this year in salary and perquisites about eight thousand dollars.

—Lorenz MICHEL, the French socialist, is tall and thin, with square shoulders, and a high but somewhat receding forehead. She dresses in black, and wears a long black veil. Her voice is clear, and her utterance fluent and distinct. She demands that women shall have the right to work on equal terms with men.

—The "Congress of Professors of French," held recently in London under the presidency of the French Consul General, has resolved to admit governesses "as adherent members of the society."

—The decorations and furniture of Mr. W. H. VANDERBILT'S Japanese parlor, which adjoins his drawing-room, cost thirty thousand dollars.

—Mr. CHARLES JOHNSON'S monthly lectures before the Composition Class of the Art Students' League are making a deep impression upon his listeners.

—Professor EMERSON HAVELL writes from Ceylon, where he has been travelling, that he procured the greatest delicacies for his table by hunting. Of these delicacies the best was roast monkey. "This noble game proved excellent, whether freshly roasted or laid for some time in vinegar." The flesh of the flying-fox was less agreeable, but the gigantic lizard when cooked resembled veal. On one occasion the chief of a village gave the professor a reception, and "a band of five tom-tom-beaters and as many flute-players began to make a noise that would soften a stone. At the same time two dancers, on stilts twelve feet high, executed the most wonderful evolutions. Meanwhile the chief's daughters, plump, black-haired maidens, from twelve to twenty years of age, with very delicately shaped limbs, offered teddy or palm wine in cocoa-nut shells, and cakes and fruit. Unfortunately I could not understand a word of the long speech which the chief addressed to me, but I made out that he was telling me he considered my visit a great honor—an idea that was pantomimically carried out by ten naked painted and decorated dancers, who jumped madly round my throne."

PAUL GUSTAVE DORÉ.

The sudden and unexpected death of this eminent artist sent a thrill of sorrow and regret through two continents. His popularity was not confined to his own country. He was as well known in England and America as he was in France; and his own countrymen can not grieve more sincerely over his untimely decease than do the people on this side of the world, who have admired him and his work ever since he became known here through the publication of his illustrations to the legend of the Wandering Jew.

His life has been one of extraordinary industry and success. Born at Strasburg in 1832, he went to Paris in his thirteenth year, and finished his youthful studies at the Lycée Charlemagne, and when only fifteen was employed on the Journal pour Rire. He also sent some pen-drawings to the Salon in 1848, and continued to exhibit every succeeding year. In 1857 his work received honorable mention, and the exceptional merit and originality of his designs were recognized on every hand. The fertility of his imagination was marvellous, and not less so was the amount of work which he accomplished. This, indeed, was to be regretted, so eager was he to produce the weird and fantastic drawings which were so popular that he gave himself an opportunity for the reflection and study which would have developed his extraordinary powers of mind, and enabled him to achieve something greater than anything he has done in painting or design.

Doré's works are so numerous that a mere catalogue of their titles would fill a large volume. It has been estimated that his designs number more than 30,000; and at the time of his death his imagination was as fertile as ever, and his hand had lost none of its cunning. Of course there is a vast amount of rubbish among these drawings. Many of them, like the razors in Peter Pindar's story, were "made to sell", and, unfortunately for Doré's fame, they did sell. No other artist ever had a following so large and enthusiastic. Everything which he produced was eagerly caught up. Art was with him an industry. He drew innumerable pictures for illustrated journals, in almost every phase of art—caricature, landscape, pathos, satire; and in all his facility was simply wonderful. But his fame rests chiefly on his book illustrations. His designs for the works of RABELAIS, the Wandering Jew, BALZAC's Contes Drolatiques, the Essays of MONTAIGNE, Don Quixote, DANTE's Inferno, TENNYSON's poems, MILTON's Paradise Lost, the Bible, COLERIDGE's Ancient Mariner, etc., gave him a world-wide celebrity. The sale of these works was immense, and their popularity has not declined with time. They are bold, as a matter of course, in various grades of estimation, on the one hand hooked to the skies, on the other condemned with every possible note of depreciation. The true estimate lies between these extremes. "It is hazardous," says MR. JARVIS, "to undertake to analyze the gifts of a man who, at only thirty-two, has made nearly fifty thousand designs, and won universal fame; who is cosmopolitan in his choice of subjects, as familiar with the great writers of England, Germany, Italy, and Spain as with his own, and who finally laid the whole Orient under contribution by illustrating anew for the nineteenth century the Bible." Again, dwelling on a certain cast of Doré's mind, MR. JARVIS says: "If the preponderant trait of DELACROIX was physical force, that of Doré is fiendish horror. That which devils most enjoy he most heartily depicts . . . Even DANTE, reared in mediæval notions of theology and politics, finds some springs of tenderness, and always of faith, in his soul: but Doré, in translating his Inferno into pictorial French, discards all humanity, and presents the horrors of the Dantesque imagery in forms more appalling than the original."

PAUL GUSTAVE DORÉ.

The first of Doré's works which made a decided impression in this country was his Wandering Jew. Here his imagination had full play, and he gave it a loose rein. No other of his works approaches it as grotesque, grim horror. The power of these designs is undeniable; the work immensely enhanced Doré's reputation, and the demand for his designs became so clamorous that his publishers could not supply it. His Bible illustrations, engraved by the greatest masters of the art in France, were no less popular, and his Milton and Tennyson went through many editions. The magnificent edition of his Don Quixote, published at vast expense, and with every luxury of paper, printing, and binding, proved to be so popular that the plates were used in many cheaper editions in America and England.

None of Doré's recent works has had a more extended sale in this country than his Ancient Mariner. COLERIDGE's weird and fantastic poem presented a magnificent field for the display of Doré's best qualities. Here was everything to excite and nothing to trammel his imagination. The excellence and beauty of his illustrations were at once acknowledged. They took a strong hold on the public, and the volume, which was brought out in this country by HARPER & BROTHERS, by arrangement with the author and his Paris publishers, became at once one of the most popular gift-books of the season—a popularity which it still retains.

The success of this remarkable work suggested to HARPER & BROTHERS the idea of engaging GUSTAVE DORÉ to illustrate a volume for their house; and in the course of the correspondence which ensued it transpired that the artist was already meditating a series of illustrations to Poe's Raven, a poem which had taken a strong hold on his imagination. The wonderful advance which the art of wood-engraving had made in this country convinced him that nowhere else could his designs be more faithfully and artistically rendered. Other work, already on hand, prevented him from prosecuting this scheme until last summer, when he took it up with his accustomed energy. The designs, twenty-six in number, were executed in about sixty days, and sent to this city to be engraved. They were at once placed in the hands of the most distinguished men in the profession, for whom no pains have been spared to render them in the best and most effective style of which wood-engraving will admit. The designs are among the most remarkable of the long series of illustrations which have come from Doré's hand, and they will be published in a form and style worthy of the master's work. The volume, now ready for the press, will be similar in size and shape to the Ancient Mariner, and will contain twenty-four full-page engravings, and two smaller ones, with a portrait of the artist.

It is an interesting fact that Doré's last and in many respects his best work should have been executed for an American publishing house, and put on wood by American engravers. He was ambitious of its success, and competent critics who have seen proofs taken from the finished blocks assert that nothing finer has ever been done on wood.

Doré was unmarried. His home is thus pleasantly described in a recent letter to the San Francisco Chronicle:

"He has lived for years in his mother's house in the Rue St. Dominique, St. Germain, the ancient, historic faubourg, or full of mediæval residences and old aristocratic hotels. His house is approached through a large porte cochère, opening into a court-yard, where you mount a broad staircase, and reach a large apartment furnished after the French manner, but filled with objects and mementoes of every sort. There are bits of armor, pictures, engravings, books, bric-a-brac, musical instruments, tapestry, rare old wrought china, manuscript, mural designs, to which the artist is at will.—[An odd nor brainmatic-looking hatter in the Rue Bayard a large studio, one of the finest, if not the finest, in the city.]

Doré died on Tuesday, January 23. He caught cold on the previous Friday, while returning to his home from a soirée. Inflammation of the throat set in, and despite all effort it was impossible to arrest its progress. He died in the fullness of his powers, and when he had reason to look forward to many years of active life.

APPROACHING THE TRUTH

CHAPTER IX.

"THEY ARE VERY MUCH ALIKE"

They were strange, almost unaccountable feelings with which Lucy Brake watched the approach of Kitty Vanch. She did not think till then that matters foreign to herself had her grave thoughts of life could have so materially affected her. She was afraid her hand was trembling, for little Morice looked up into her face as if for an explanation of it, and she was sure her heart was beating [illegible].

After all, what did this meeting portend? The explanation was not likely to be elaborate, and the story of Greg's love for her could be treated so lightly that her listener might by the very force of example be brought to regard it lightly too. And if she, Lucy Brake, were sentimental, of a surety Kitty was not. Kitty looked at life practically, and yet was so fond of Greg that she was certain to forgive, perhaps laugh at, Greg's romance. And if it were romance? thought Lucy, as though some doubt of Master Dorward's bona fides crossed his mind even at that instant.

How to begin, in what way to dash into a delicate subject, and conclude it satisfactorily before Farm Forlorn was reached, was not as clearly apparent to her as it had been, and now that the distance between her and Kitty was diminishing with every moment.

Kitty was walking briskly; she had seen them, and increased her pace just at the time when Lucy had wished she would saunter more slowly by the way, or wait for them to come up with her.

Was this task beyond her strength, after all? thought Lucy. She was a weak woman, seriously weak in argument and self-possession; and yet she expected to influence one whose strength of character was certainly greater than her own, and whom she did not wholly understand. She might act her against her, just to she was burning to be loved, and proud of the affection she had drawn toward herself. She hoped not that, for there was in her mind even the wild fancy that they were being drawn together for some reason, inexplicable and strange, and that the time was advancing when they would be of help to one another. All fanciful, but not to be set aside in the mind of one whose life with fancies had influenced and marred, and who would escape by fancy still if possible from the grim realities by which she was surrounded.

Kate Vanch had reached her now, little Morice had run on to meet her, and was jumping with delight at her side, and asking many questions, and Kate was bright with smiles.

"I did not think to find you on the Heathcope road," said Kate; "I came a little way to meet Greg. You have seen him, Morice tells me?"

"Yes, I have seen him," repeated Lucy, some what confused at being thus forestalled.

Kitty regarded her curiously, perhaps critically, and then said, briskly,

"Where has he gone?"

"I think he—he said he must take another road to the farm," stammered Lucy; "and that I was to keep you company instead. You do not mind?"

"You have arranged it very nicely between you," said Kitty, laughing, "although I don't quite understand it yet; and I don't mind your company, Lucy—indeed, am very glad of it."

"Mamma," remarked little Morice at this juncture, and to her young mother's intense dismay, "was to tell you all about it. Mister Dorward said so."

"Oh!" ejaculated Lucy.

What awkward remarks children will make at times, and what powers of observation they possess!—observing without being observed, which is a great faculty, a wise man has assured us. And here little Morice had precipitated the crisis of explanation most wofully.

Kitty Vanch turned to Lucy.

"What's the matter?" she asked.

The dark eyes were full of inquiry—clear, bright, and unflinching; it looked as if the elder speaker might require consolation rather than the tall young woman at her side.

"Yes, I have a little to tell you, Kitty. Nothing much—nothing very serious, for that matter," said Lucy, in reply; "and which you will see in its true light, and smile at, I dare say."

"Very likely, I hope so," was the quick answer back.

"And—"

"And as little children notice a great deal, and talk a great deal more of what they see and hear," said Kitty, interrupting her, "might it not be as well for Morice to run on in advance of us?"

"Yes, I think it would," replied Lucy.

Morice received her instructions, and was dispatched to disobey them, until pacified and bribed by the new custody of her mother's parasol, with which she tripped along some thirty yards ahead, looking behind her now and then to make quite sure that there was no deep plan to desert her on the part of her friends following.

"I suppose it is about Greg, all this," remarked Kitty, when they were alone together on the road to Farm Forlorn; "so you can rely upon a patient listener."

"It is very little to tell you, Kitty, after all," Lucy began again; "and you are a sensible girl who will look upon it in the right light."

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1362.

"Who looks upon it in the wrong?"

"Miss Brake," answered Lucy; "she has been having a long conversation with me to-day about you."

"About me and Greg together. Is not that it?"

"Yes."

"Poor mistress! she lets everything trouble her, even my engagement to Greg Dorward," said Kitty; "but then she is an invalid, and has much to brood upon. I have never known her really well, and that includes everything."

"Yes," said Lucy again, thinking it was rather strange that Kitty was having all the talk at present, and she was answering in monosyllables. Kitty saw this too, and added

"But I have to listen to you, Mrs. Brake. I forget."

"If you will call me Lucy, always, instead of Mrs. Brake, I shall be glad," said the widow. "It was understood a week ago that we were friends enough for that, and to be always friends, and under every circumstance of life, from this time forth, you and I, I hope."

"I'm sure—and—and Morice—I mean," she added, with a sudden reserve, "I think I'm sure."

"You must not have a doubt of it, or a doubt of me," said Lucy, very earnestly; "that would be to grieve me. I want you to believe implicitly in me, and what I tell you, otherwise I fail."

"Fail in what?" asked Kitty.

"Miss Brake said to-day Kitty, that you would never be happy with Greg for your husband, that he was not deserving of you, that he did not love you," began Lucy, dashing desperately into the subject at last; "all this is a great mistake of judgment on her part, but which she wished me to tell you, and which I promised I would."

"I thought it was Greg whom you promised," said Kitty, a little bewildered in her turn.

"I had to ask Greg's permission to speak of this at all."

"You are very kind, Lucy. I do not know, in your place, whether I should have been so considerate on that, or thought of that. But," she said, and so quick enlightening one, "why Greg?"

"Because I had promised Greg never to speak of this—to keep his secret, such as it was, to myself."

"Greg's secret, too, then?"

"Yes. A foolish thing altogether, based on nothing—on a silly fancy even," said Lucy.

"On Greg's being in love with you? That is it, I suppose," said Kitty, very quietly now. Perhaps too quietly, thought Lucy.

"Yes, that is it," was the reply, "on Greg's fancying that he was—being only a boy; and boys always take romantic ideas into their heads concerning women older than themselves."

"You are not an old woman, Lucy," Kitty remarked. "I don't suppose two years make much difference between man and woman at any time, and with real love between them—"

"But there was no love between us," said Lucy, quickly, in her turn; "on the contrary, a little dislike on my part, a feeling of offence, perhaps of wounded pride, that he should think it possible I could forget my murdered Morris, who—"

"Never mind your Morris just now," said Kitty, impatiently; "I have heard as much about him to my time. We can talk of him presently, Lucy, on the farm. Tell me of Greg, the one who is all to all to me, who was all in all to me when I was a little desolate wretch with an father, mother, sister, to keep me straight, only the police man at the corner of the Rents?"

"Well," continued Lucy, "there was a passing fancy for me in Greg's mind so he grew up. I was kind to him, I was interested, like my father and Mr. Woodhatch, in his facility for acquiring knowledge, in his perseverance and industry. But as for any love for him, I had none to give to any body."

"Not even for John Woodhatch who loved it," muttered Kitty. "No," she added, "I don't suppose you would care for me Greg. That he should love you was very natural, and I have wondered before this why he did not. For you are a beautiful woman, Lucy Brake, though you do not want my word to tell you so."

Lucy blushed, and did not answer. She was not particularly vain of her good looks, but she was conscious of her beauty, and possibly of its power.

"If he had told me as himself," Kitty continued, "I could have forgiven him, for what was I to him, after all? And what," she added, sadly, "could he remember of me but a child's shadow in a London street? It was my doubt always that he should keep me in his memory; it was only the dear master watching us, as God watches us, I think, who said, 'I will bring these two strange lives together, I will mid it like a story-book'—who thought we were more even than we were, and children as we were," she added, shivering, "and that it was my one chance, and his duty, that we should become man and wife."

"As you will do, having each other very truly," said Lucy.

"Yes, I love him very truly," answered Kitty, thoughtfully. "I have always loved him. I was the only one who understood him as a child; perhaps I am the only one who sees clearly now what he will become. When a boy, whom everybody feared but me, he would share his last crust—the crust he had stolen—with Kitty Vanch, when we had been driven out-of-doors together to steal, by Greg's father or mother, we would, if unlucky," she added, sorrowfully, "console each other by hopes and fancies for the morrow as we huddled together amongst the baskets in the market, or on the dung-heaps in the stable-yards. We were together, helping each other, that was enough. We had no other friends. And I would help him now, in everything and for everything, even if he hated me."

"Which he does not, you are sure."

"No; he likes me—a little."

"I am sure he loves you as well as—"

"As I deserve," cried Kitty, with a short laugh. "Ah! I don't fancy there is much love in the matter, now you have told me he has thought of me. Of course," she added, with a little sigh, "that can not be."

"It can."

"He is afraid of Mr. Woodhatch, who has asked him to marry me."

"You must not look upon it in that light," said Lucy.

"I don't know in what light we to look at it," answered Kitty, irresolutely. "I want time to think it over, and to see what is best—what is best for Greg, I mean, not for me. That doesn't matter."

"What is best is that you should not think any more about it," said Lucy, cheerfully. "The decision is settled, you are going to be married, and the rest is the morbid fancies of a sick woman who thinks too much of herself, and the doubts of a true-hearted girl"—touching her arm—"who thinks too little. And that is never wise."

"I suppose not," answered Kitty. "but then," she added, quaintly, "I have such a very little to be proud of. I should not think much of this—what is it, after all—"

"Ah! what is it?" said Lucy, with alacrity.

"If," continued Kitty, "it was all over, had happened two years ago, and Greg was smiling at it now—or at all events not grieving. Well, one must remember this. I am not likely to make him in any way unhappy—and by marrying him I might."

"No, no—surely not."

"Did he ever ask you straightforwardly to become his wife?" she asked.

"Yes—he asked me."

"When?"

Lucy Brake did not relish this questioning, more particularly this identical question, which certainly was a leading one, and of an awkward tendency. She was compelled to answer truth fully, although it was in her heart to deceive her, and for her good. But Kitty Vanch looked like a woman whom it would be difficult to deceive just then.

"A little while ago," she said at last.

"How long ago?"

"I—I can hardly remember."

"Oh yes, you can. You will in a minute or two," said the persistent Kitty.

Lucy hesitated again. She was not getting on very well—not on well as, in her naive concern, she had imagined that she was. This was a quest tion worse than all the rest. What put it into Kitty's head to ask it, of all troublesome questions in the world?

"Was it before I came to Kings Shore, or after ward?" said Kitty, further, as if to assist her fair companion's memory.

"Well—afterward," confessed Lucy at last. "You had just arrived—he was unsettled, and out his quiet self."

"Had he seen me?"

Oh no," said Lucy, with alacrity. "It was before he had seen you."

"I am glad to hear that," responded Kitty. "I dare say it was on the night I found him tramping along the sands—where we met again after five years of separation—after nine years, if I do not reckon seeing him at the railway station. That's it."

"To part as children, and to meet as man and woman resolving to begin life together, speaks well for faithfulness on both sides," said Lucy, "the romance between was—but romance."

"You are never likely to care for Greg?"

"Never."

"He does not seem—quite good enough for you?"

Lucy looked askance at Kate, as though she could believe there was satire in this question ing, but the grave, sad face was an mocking expression to check all sympathy toward her. Kitty had asked in simple faith, and was waiting patiently for a reply.

"I have not thought of that at any time. It is not at present's part a true woman thinks, but of his present life."

"Thank you. That is John Woodhatch's teaching."

"Yes."

"And your father's?"

"And my father's, no doubt."

"And under any circumstances," continued Kitty, "you would not marry Greg Dorward?"

"Not under any circumstances."

"I am worrying you with many questions, said Kitty, "but this is a serious point in my life, and it is difficult to decide."

"In there much to decide, after all? You are engaged to be married, the day has been fixed," said Lucy. "Yes—"

"I am thanking of Greg," cried Kitty, impatiently, "as I told you just now. Not of myself. And I will not stand in his light. Why should I?"

"You do not."

"He will answer that for himself," said Kitty, quietly; "he is not likely to quarrel with me when I tell him he can have his new way, and not as he thinks best. It is not a very serious matter, as you say."

"No."

"I suppose men are all very much alike, but then I don't know much about them," said Kitty, irresolutely. "I have been brought up with Miss Brake of late years, and that away from lovers. I can fancy most men being wild and weak and unfaithful, as they mix in the world and see so many faces to tempt them."

"What an awful, miserable thought!" exclaimed Lucy at this. "One would have most mercy for such wretches as that."

"We should be more likely to forgive them," said Kitty, smiling—"after a good scolding, as I may forgive Greg for thinking you so much more to be preferred for his wife than Kitty Vanch. But," she added, "men are weaker than women—I am sure of that."

"My Morris was not weak," cried Lucy, confidently.

"Yes he was—very," was the thought-less answer.

"What?" cried Lucy, forgetting the motive which had brought them together that afternoon, and changing on the instant from the wise, kindly counsellor to the indignant woman—"what did you say? What did you dare to say?"

Kitty Vanch turned pale at this sudden outburst, and then colored.

"I am sorry if I have pained you. I had forgotten for a moment," she said.

"Forgotten what?"

"That you were his wife—that he had been very dear to you," replied Kitty. "I hope you will forgive my foolishness. I did not know what I was saying."

"Then Morris was not weak?" cried Lucy; "you were not thinking of him when you announced me?"

Kitty did not reply to this interrogatory. It was her turn to find questions vexatious and embarrassing.

"Were you thinking of him?" asked Lucy again.

"Yes," said Kitty; "it's no use my pretending I was not. I saw Morris Brake a great deal the year before he died—he came often to his sister's house, and I used to think then he was very weak."

"In what way weak?" asked Lucy; "tell me, please, Kitty, what you mean?"

"I can not tell you any more, save that I thought him weak. Weak in his good opinion of himself, his handsome face, his manners, and vain of his own judgment—little faults that Miss Brake said he inherited from his father," answered Kitty, with great rapidity of utterance.

"His father ran away from his children and his wife to live with another woman. Have you heard that?" said Lucy.

"Yes, part of it," said Kate. "Don't worry me, Lucy, with fresh stories. Has it not struck you I have had enough of my own misery to-day, without hearing of other people's?"

"I will say no more. Ooh, Kitty, you frightened me," said Lucy, with a shudder.

"You must not mind what I say."

"No," said Lucy, very thoughtfully, "I will try not."

They were close upon the farm, and Morice Brake ran on toward it, being tired of her own company, and conscious that even her mother did not care for it at present.

Presently she was at the farm-house gate, holding John Woodhatch be one hand and her grandfather by the other, swinging herself between them and laughing merrily. Greg Dorward stood there also, having reached home quickly by an easier route. At the distant window sat Miss Brake knitting busily, with Carlo watching her, as though he was taking a lesson in the art, at the door, under the creepers which were flourishing above the porch, stood Mrs. Chadderton, prim and neat in her black dress, and above all skies were the blue sky and God's sunshine. It was a fair picture, but what a host of thoughts at work beneath the placid masks of these strange folk about here! If they could have read each other's thoughts that afternoon, or the rustling green trees could have whispered when they were!

Kitty walked on a few paces in advance of Lucy. She had seen Greg already, and noticed that his face was pale, and wore an anxious look. He smiled faintly as she approached him, but his dark, deep set eyes looked closely into hers, perhaps asking a question which before that group of friends he dared not shape into outspoken words.

"You me home before me, then," she said, smiling very faintly too. "Did you come by the other road?"

"Yes, Kitty," he answered.

As she passed him she slipped her hand into his for a moment, and pressed it in earnest of good faith, of trust in him, of her own affection, and then went slowly into the house and upstairs to her own room.

CHAPTER X

THE RESULT OF IT.

Gregory Dorward was not quite happy in his mind, although he possessed the art of concealing his emotions tolerably well. He had more upon than mind, too, than Lucy or Kitty imagined, and Miss Brake's first move in her campaign against him, or Kitty—which was it?—had been successful in his uncomfortable way. Still, the ice was broken; Kate Vanch understood the position, and there was one secret the less. He hoped Lucy Brake had told the truth after her own fair fashion, and better then he could have done it, but there was a feeling at his heart now that he might have told it better, having love on Kitty's side to plead for him.

If he wanted it to plead for him, for on are not certain how Gregory Dorward regarded the position, any more than Kitty was certain. He was not sure, either, that he had escaped cross-examination by Lucy's proposition that she should undertake this delicate matter for him; he and Kitty must speak of this when they were alone together for the first time, and when Miss Brake was not watching them on curiously. It was not likely they could go on side by side as if nothing had happened since the happy, peaceful yesterday.

Later in the day, in the beginning of the evening, with the sky aglow with crimson, Kitty Vanch and Greg Dorward strolled across the flat, sandy land to the sea-shore, where they had met first to man and woman. Greg had proposed going, and Kitty had acquiesced very readily, and there they were alone together, as they had wished and Greg had ashamed for. If an explanation were to come a crisis, it was better it should come at once, both thought now, for time was hastening on, and the present position had grown perplexing and false.

Greg would not be nervous over his statement;

Lucy Brake had paved the way for him, when he had shrunk at first from telling Kitty the whole story for himself. A few words now might be necessary, nothing more, but he did not say these till the deep stretch of not sands was beneath their feet, and them was no living soul upon it but themselves.

"You have been told a strange story to-day, Kitty," said Greg at last, "and you feel you hate me for it."

"Not at all," answered Kitty, very calmly and yet sadly, "it was what I thought must happen three years ago or more, when John Woodhatch spoke of my marrying you. If you had grown to be a gentleman almost, I could not fancy my being a lady to match, and I could fancy your choosing for yourself, and not thinking much of me. And it was Lucy Brake's fault you did not."

"Yes; that is partly it, Kitty," he confessed; "I wish I could say it was not."

"As it is the truth, I am glad to hear you say it," she answered; "we shall get on better without lies, Greg."

"Certainly," he replied. "And are you very much offended with me?"

"I am not offended."

"Surprised?"

"To hear it all for the first time to-day, as first as it was—yes."

"And sorry?"

"Very," said Kitty, without a moment's hesitation.

"After all," said Greg, "there is not much to be sorry for. The story is ended, Kitty, and we shall be happy enough without Lucy Brake to bother us."

"I am not quite sure of it," answered Kitty; "it is not so easy to me the end of it."

"She can never be anything to me," said Greg; "and I am not one to fret for a woman who would not have me. It is all over."

Kate Vanch looked at him, and said, in a strange, pitying tone,

"Poor Greg!"

"Why do you say 'poor Greg'?" he asked.

"Because you love her still," she answered, "because her beauty is a snare for you, and still bewilders you, because it would be heaven's happiness for you to call her your wife, and because you never, never can."

"I have said it is all over."

"But you love her."

"I am not sure of that."

"Oh! but I am. Sure, too, that you are sure, only you think it kind to spare my feelings—as if I had any feelings worth considering, Greg!" she added, with a little sigh.

"We do not come to any fair understanding by useless talk like this," he said, presently. "I have been a fool, and I own it. She was not fit to be my wife, she would not have been a helpmate to me, and you are the very one to suit me in all respects, knowing me so well. And we shall be happy, by God, I hope we shall!"

He was excited, and gesticulated almost in dramatic fashion.

"But you have no real love for me?"

"Yes, I have."

"Ah, no, Greg, I know better than that," said Kitty. "You would marry me, but at any moment there might come to you an happiness, or an temptation; and without me there will be freedom, and the power to make your own way. And so, Greg, I am about as likely to be your wife as Lucy Brake."

"Kitty!"

"This afternoon," she continued, "I thought I could make up my mind to let things go as just the same, that I should be able to make you comfortable and contented in the new home at Blackthorpe. But no, it can not be."

"Why not, Kitty?" asked Greg.

"You might learn to hate me. Once tied to me for life, you might learn to see in me a line on your advancement. You will be better without me altogether," she replied.

"You can not tell."

"Yes, I think I can," was the answer. "Why, I should only doubt you now, feel I was in the way, be always afraid of you."

"Has it come to fear?"

"Not as we are. But I—I don't quite make you out, Greg, always. You not beyond me, not in any way like the Greg Dorward I knew once."

"Is not that something to be glad of, remembering what I was?" he asked, bitterly.

"Ay—yes, thank Heaven; but I should like the boy's love back again—at least the trust in me, the feeling I was of help to him, the old Greg Dorward, even in his rage," she exclaimed.

"We may come to rage again, now that we defy John Woodhatch," said Greg, gloomily.

"Then I will come to you," cried Kitty, "if you'll have me. To help you out of trouble, always Kitty Vanch; to be miserable in your prosperity, why, never!"

"I haven't lost you, then," muttered Greg, scornfully; "there is some hope for me."

"Ah! you can say bitter things," said Kitty; "but I do not mind them."

"I feel bitterly," he answered; "I feel that everything is crumbling to dust beneath my touch."

"You will be rich, you will be prosperous," said Kitty. "Mr Woodhatch will not think any the worse of us for altering our minds."

"You do not know him as well as I do."

"I will take the blame upon myself," said Kitty.

"He will not believe you," Greg replied; "he will require full explanations of the reasons which have parted us."

"I will give them to him."

"If you tell him I have thought of Lucy Brake, it will be my ruin," said Greg. "You know he loves her. You have heard people say he killed Morris Brake because of her."

"No one is likely to believe that now," said Kitty; "and he will not be hard on me. I will tell him—which is the plain truth, Greg—that I have altered my mind; that I feel I was not fit for you, or good enough."

"Good enough!" he cried.

"Or clever enough, or well-educated enough, to be your wife. That, despite your wish," Kitty went on, "I will not have you, and don't care for you. And I will not say a word of Lucy Brake."

"And your mistress? That horrible woman," he said, "hiding like a witch in the darkness, she will know all."

"She knows it already."

"And," he said, "you can trust her not to tell the master? I would as soon trust Mrs. Chadderton."

"I would trust them both in this."

"Why?"

"They would spare him a care at any cost," said Kitty, "and he will be satisfied if we tell him we shall be happier apart."

"You do not know him," said Greg again.

"Oh, Greg! we shall see who knows him best in a little while," she said, "and let us part friends, you and I, at least."

"Are we going to part for good?"

"We part as lovers—if we have ever been lovers. Nothing more than that. To remain as brother and sister always—if you will," she answered.

"No," he said, slowly, "let it be for good. You will go away with your mistress as soon as it is possible, and then the less we see of each other the better for us both."

She drew a little quick breath at this, then said, "Yes, I think so too."

Greg stopped, as if this was the end of it all, and there was no more to be said, and Kitty understood the movement, and went on slowly toward Farm Fotlorn alone. There was no more to say; she had explained everything that was on her mind, she had told Greg what the had determined, and he had not urged her very warmly, very passionately, to reconsider her decision. He had spoken more of the result of the separation, and of how John Woodhatch would regard it, than of our disappointment in his own part; of what would be his prospects after this, not what would become of her, seeing her love for him still, letting him see that he was first and foremost in her heart, but witnessing but little affection in return, only a poor clumsy imitation of it, that did not stir her, unless it was to anger.

Well, there was an end of it. Better that it was all concluded in this fashion, thought Kitty, than to make him miserable for life, to feel day by day increasing the horrible conviction that she was a clog upon him, a something between him and his progress. What would become of her presently she did not know; across the waste land of her life stretched the rugged up-hill path with no light upon it yet, and the must pursue it to its close. There would be an one to care for her after this; and she did not want any one so sure.

She went straight to her own little room, tired out with doubts. Miss Brake had given her permission, and guessed the object of her going.

"It is all working as I wish," she whispered to herself as Kitty went away. There had been an difficulty in noting how Kitty's brief love story had ended. The fate of the girl was calm enough, but it was the gravity of a fixed despair. Kitty Vanch had been so happy—so truly happy—only that bright morning, having acted for the best, she was now like a child, shut out from happiness forever. Greg would be all right presently, and that would be her solace presently too; not yet awhile.

She sat and thought of this as the open window of her room, looking upward at the shimmering stars, and hour after hour passed away without much knowledge of time and how it stole along seeking not of her love troubles. She heard the shutters of the farm-house closing, the voices of men and women below calling good-nights to one another, and to John Woodhatch, who answered cheerily, not guessing yet that his last grand scheme had collapsed, and thinking all was fairly well at Skegs Shore. Footsteps echoed along the corridors without and died away, doors were closed and locked, and presently, when all was very still, her own door, which she had not fastened, was tried, and then opened, and Lucy Brake came stealthily into the room and laid her hand upon her shoulder.

"It is all over between you and Greg," she said, and in so stern a tone of voice that Kitty looked up in faint surprise.

"Yes. Do not let us talk of him again to-night, please."

"I have not come to speak of him," said Lucy.

"Thank you for that."

"I have come to speak of my lost husband."

"Ah, well," said Kitty, wearily; "what of him now?"

"Why did you not tell me all the truth this afternoon, when we were so close upon it? Where was your frankness—your good faith—of which they boast we these parts?"

"Who do?"

"Answer this, and tell me the truth in one word, if you can," cried Lucy, without replying to her question; "one word will do it, and I will not believe it from her."

"From Miss Brake, do you mean?"

"Yes."

"Can not you spare me for one night?" urged Kitty; "can not you see my grief for the living is greater than yours should be for the dead?"

"Ha! you know what I am going to say!" cried Lucy.

"I think I do," Kitty responded.

"Did my husband Morris, then, at any time," asked Lucy, in a voice that shook with its emotion—"I mean a little while before his death—only a week or two, my God! and after we were married—make love to you?"

"Yes," answered Kitty Vanch.

"WE ONLY!"

Come, wife, dear woman, and sit by me,
For the toilsome day is done,
And many thoughts in my heart are born
With the setting of the sun.
Ay, give me your hand, my patient love,
That my own may clasp it tight;
Not dearer it was in the years agone,
Dear wife, than it is to-night.

Old and wrinkled it may be, dear,
But look you, wife, at the shine
Of the ring that has clung to your finger there
Since the day that I made you mine
'Twas a long, long march from our youth to age,
But Time, he he's'er an gray,
Can never tarnish the badge, dear,
Of the pledge of our wedding day.

E'en as the truth of a faithful love,
Born far in the auld long syne,
In our steadfast hearts, through weal and woe,
Never has ceased an shine.
There are tears in your eyes, my wife, to-night;
You are thinking, dear, I know,
How strange it is that as shadows fall
We only are left below—

We only, to sit at the old hearth-stone
In the twilight, dear, of life,
While our children wait to the gates above:
When shall we meet them, wife?
Nay, dry those tears, and be glad with me
That the day is almost done,
And father, mother, and children all
May meet—with the set of sun.

THE WATER-COLOR EXHIBITION.

HEAD OF PEASANT.—J. C. Beckwith.

That prosperous organization, the American Water-color Society, has just opened its sixteenth annual exhibition at the National Academy of Design, to the usual and reasonable expectation of selling a vast number of pictures—thirty thousand dollars' worth at least—and of having a good time generally. For some years, indeed, the American Water-colorist has been altogether the cheerfulest type of artist to be seen on this side of the Atlantic. The public buys his works, and attends the display of them; and neither the beauty nor the fashion of the metropolis is scandalized by the question, "Have you seen the Water-color Exhibition?"

Of course the American Water-colorist has earned this bliss, for did ever an American picture-buyer unjustly praise an American picture-maker? or praise him too much? or hedge his work too honorably in his home? The American Water-colorist, not to put too fine a point on him, enjoys the most decided artistic success in the city. He understands his business, for one thing, knows the value of broad relations of color, the proper subserviency of details to masses, the blessedness of suggesting an idea rather than chopping it fine and beating it in a resort, the excellence of translating ethereal effects out-of-doors, the indispensableness of snap, sparkle, vivacity, spontaneity. He shows us in the winter what he gathered for us in the summer. He brings autumn, too, to our hearts, and if he has known to tell of, we may be sure that his information comes not from gossip, but from actual observation.

Then he is the most generous-minded fellow in the world, admitting to his annual exhibitions pictures of all classes and conditions, and treating each with courtesy, in spite of his dislike of some. There, for instance, are the works of Mr Fanon Cranam. Though the American Water-colorist has not yet climbed into the admiration of them, the least discerning visitor to this sixteenth annual exhibition will not fail to notice how hospitably Mr Cranam has been received. Not less than five—possibly six—of his fearless productions appear in the principal gallery, one of them on the line, and in return for this protracted generous-mindedness Mr Cranam that time has painted more vehemently than ever before, instead of sending more memoranda of color, he has in two instances forwarded real organized wholes. Mr Bush, Mr Lemmens, and Mr Mcmanway also have done more than formerly to dispute the doubt of the scoffer respecting their ability as picture-makers, and Mr W. M. Chase's young lady in black feels unwontedly at home in her present surroundings.

Doubtless it would not be too much to say that to hem the sunny landscape with figures, signed E. A. Abbey and Alfred Parsons, and situated in the place of honor over the South Room, is more fully the ideal of what a water-color picture should be than any other work in the exhibition. So lack of serious and beautiful inspiration here, no lack of exquisite technique; but a fine scale of looking at nature with a desire to get, not a photograph, but a local and pictorial representation, and this too within the strictest limits of the water-colorist's art. Beyond the shadows of the foreground trees the green field lies in heightened sunshine, which softly glows on the tower, roof, and walls of the old stone church; and the perfect collaboration by which Mr Abbey has introduced into Mr. Parsons's landscape the figures of the two village lovers lends to the total impression added intellectual charm. Mr Abbey has painted many highly vitalized and interesting faces than those of these maids, but he has never made the human figure more indispensably an integral part of a landscape.

Yet if for the numerous class of works of which the one just mentioned may be considered as at the head in the present exhibition the American Water-colorist has a special and genial affection, there is another class that he is always ready to swear by, and to the head of this class Mr Winslow Homer stepped up some time ago. It can not be doubted that the opinion long held by most of the French artists, and still held by many of them, that water-color painting on paper, as distinguished from frosco or oil painting, is better fitted for girls than for men, has even in this country some advocates in the studios, and of course some advocates outside of them. To all such persons Mr Winslow Homer has had the honor of demonstrating more ably than any other American the virility of resource of the water-colorist's art. In his hands it is pre-eminently a man's art, and there are certain things of his in the sixteenth exhibition, notably the pose and expression of that brawny woman who stands in the wind beside a stream waiting for a boat to come and fetch her, which the Greeks might have admired for commanding attitude, and Michael Angelo for the evidence that statuesqueness may have a soul.

The painter who, two or three years ago, introduced us to the American shepherdess as she can be seen any day in the uplands of New York State, now invites us into the society of the American fisherwoman as she can be seen any day on the coast of Maine. But as either the shepherdess nor the fisherwoman had ever visited the metropolis before, nor (to speak with strict truth) will any one who recognizes the creative possibilities of divine art suppose that either this shepherdess or this fisherwoman is visible elsewhere than in those mirrors of the painter's imagination.

The managers of the exhibition deserve the thanks of the contributors and of the public. They have made its surroundings a feast of decorative skill. They have brought together an survey of exchange which presents in a fresh and most encouraging light the American aptitude in this felicitous artistic direction. They have published an illustrated catalogue of more serious import than any of its predecessors. And they have hung the pictures in the galleries with an intelligent looking for general chromatic effect, so far as this can be realized simultaneously with attention to the traditional claims of each member of the society to a place on the line.

...to her? How shall I receive her? I know not whether I am most overjoyed or most wretched. If only I knew what I should most wisely, most rightly, do! And to think that it is all not hers, but mine—that she is in truth my guest! She has been away four months. For some time she has not written to me. I may have become an more to her than the nameless painter of her frescoes. If so—well, I will never take up my rights. It would be too much like vengeance. If she seem to care at all—well, then I will go away, send her portrait to the Salon, perhaps conquer a name in the world great enough to make it not too impossible for me to say to her, 'I love you.' No, I will not take away her little kingdom from her, I have a wider kingdom—Art. She trusted me. She shall not have come to repent it.

"The 'to-morrow' is now 'to-day.' I could sleep not at all. It is now noon; she may be here at any moment. I cursed this with a canyon in the hall room. There is still snow, but the sun is shining. They have sent her Russian sledge to meet her with the three Russian horses. Berwick is gone of his own accord with the sledge. He would never leave me before. It seems he knows. How shall I meet her? What shall I say? I feel as if I were false to her. It is absurd, but I can not resist the feeling. I hear a noise of sleigh-bells, of voices, of great doors opening and shutting, of dogs barking. them all is still again—she is come.

"It is nearly four o'clock and almost dark. I scarcely see to screw this to you by the light of the fire. The frescoes are not one-half finished; this vexes me much, but the weather has been so utterly against all work. Her friends will tell her I have purposely delayed. I suppose I shall out me her till to-morrow. The man who especially wants us me has been in with wood, and says that Lady Cairns rath has returned with her, no one else, but that many people are expected in a week from this. By that time I shall be gone. She must get the frescoes finished or she can. . They have brought me word that her ladyship sent me her compliments and wished to me me in the library; she is taking her tea there after the journey. Will I go at once? I can not refuse. She has not forgotten. I tremble at the thought of seeing her, though I long so greatly to do so. I feel as if she would read all my secrets in my face. I have her on well, and yet I can not say a word? Pray for me, dear friend. When next I shall write I shall be in Rome. Rome is the Mater Dolorosa, the Mother of Consolation.

"This was not posted last night. I open it to add that no one under heaven was ever so greatly blessed as I. Even now as I sit in the clear morning light, in my own chamber, I can not believe in my own paradise; I can not believe that, having reached no long, the angel blesses me so bad! When the servant brought me her message in the hall-room, I got up and walked through the house, and felt like a drunken man as I moved. To see her in the library! It seemed to me as if the very walls would speak to her, as if the French secrétaire would find a voice! I was like one in a dream. I found myself still in a dream, standing before her in the familiar room. It was dusk, for which I was thankful, the long dusk of these gray English days. There was a gleam of her light from the window which look west, and the full warm glow of the great fire. It stone on the silver tea-tray and on mover, on the white bear-skin by the hearth, on her as she stood there. She looked lovelier than ever I had seen her. She looked very pale and a little tired; she had what they call a tea gown on, a thing all soft old lace and gleaming trailing satin, a thing which most becomes her, I think, of all she wears. She put her hand out to me, and I bent low over it. I said nothing, I could say nothing. She, too, seemed more silent than her wont. She murmured in a hurry, indistinctly, all sorts of little phrases—there was fever at Cannes, her grandmother was unwell, she had been so bored, it was only London emptied out by the Mediterranean; she hated the nuisance of searching sun and icy wind, she liked a fast gallop over a wet Berkshire road much better. I remember all these sentences now, at the time I do not think I heard them. I was gazing at her, and thinking how I loved her, and of how I must go out of her presence and away from her in silence. I could see no other way. All this while I never spoke a word.

"She came closer to me, in the half-glow from the firelight and the lingering daylight, and we stood quite near together on the hearth. I still could not speak, I kissed again the hand she again held out to me; I kept thinking if she knew—if she knew! Perhaps I looked strangely, for her eyes had a startled glance in them. She said at last, in her old, pretty, quick fashion 'Well, have you not a word to say? Are you displeased that I am home again? What have you done on the walls? Have you been very dull?' I could not have uttered a word to save my life or hers; I could only gaze at her, and I saw she grew very red—very red, like the hothouse camellia she had at her breast. 'Why would you not come to Cannes?' she said, without looking at me. 'I wanted you, could you not understand?' I said nothing, I could hear my heart beat as if it would break my breast, but I said nothing. Then she touched my hand with hers. 'Why will you be on proud?' I heard her say, in quite a whisper. 'You do like me a little: why don't you tell me so? I do not care what any of them think: I only care for you. We might be so happy, if you would not be on proud!' Then I fell at her feet and kissed them. Later that night I told her all the truth. I showed her all the papers, she does not mind. What is hers is mine, what is mine is hers. We will tell her own friends, but not the world; the world can think what it likes. If it deem her the most generous of all living women, it will only be right for once."

The Lady Charteris, Milton Ernest, to Don Eccellino Ferrovia, Florinella-sopra-Subasco:

"I love you already! You must come to us at Easter. He means to buy that deserted palace above Florinella and make it beautiful, on that we may often visit you. He says Raimante built it, and that you have often regretted to see it forsaken."

The Lady Carnarvath of Otharstry to Lord Llandudno, White's Club, London:

"A great scandal has been most mercifully and providentially averted. Lord Charteris—for this gentleman is indisputable Lord Charteris. I see a strong resemblance in his features to poor Alcroft—behaves in the most admirable manner; he will not hear of the truth being made public. He says the world may think him the debtor of his wife if it please. It does not really matter, because, of course, either way, the first son she has will bear the same title and ultimately inherit. I am very thankful the publicity is avoided; and I reflect with pleasure that I never allowed the obscure name and place of the unknown painter to prevent my recognition of him as a high-bred gentleman. You will remember that I always said he had l'air noble. It will certainly be difficult, as you observe, to make society comprehend why we consent to such an apparently unequal, indeed improbable, union; but when it is known that we all approve, on one will venture on an adverse comment; every one will be aware that I should never give my countenance to what was either unwise or incorrect. Besides, I do not see why, in a private sort of manner, the facts should not be made known. If you think proper you can tell one or two of your friends in the window at White's, quite confidentially; it will soon be all over the town, and it will perhaps be better than to allow people to suppose a mésalliance possible to us. Estelle has been a great and sore anxiety to me for many years. I am thankful that my responsibility will pass at last into other hands. She is quite extraordinarily in love with him and obedient to him. I should never have supposed she could so change through the sweet influence of a sentiment."

Leonie Renan, Milton Ernest, to Don Eccellino Ferrovia, Florinella-sopra-Subasco:

"You must come for Easter, and leave your sanctuary on the hills for once, to give us your benediction, my first and my boldest friend!"

Mr Hollyn, Rome, to the Lady Charteris, Milton Ernest:

"I am thoroughly bewildered. But I heartily congratulate you both. I feel, as our beloved Transatlantics say, 'a little mixed.' When will the frescoes get finished? I suppose you forgive me?"

The Lady Charteris, Milton Ernest, to Mr. Hollyn, Rome:

"Yes, I forgive you even the rude nonsense you wrote. I shall always call him Renan. We shall remain here all the summer, and he will finish the frescoes!"

THE END.

THE ICE BRIDGE AT NIAGARA.

Those who have braved the discomforts of Niagara in the winter are in the habit of assuring those who have not that they have missed the great cataract at its greatest. The various esthetic nuisances which have been entailed by the commercial occupation of the shores, and which there is now a good hope of abating altogether and permanently, are mitigated and dissembled by the indiscriminate veil of the snow. The backman, sleek with his summer's booty, hibernates and sucks his paws, to emerge with the vernal equinox lean and insatiable. The bridal parties do not invade the seclusion of the winter guests, nor are articles of aboriginal manufacture thrust upon them. He is almost sure to be alone, and to be alone at Niagara is a hope that all tourists of sensibility have cherished, and few summer tourists have realized.

Moreover, the aspect of the cataract itself in winter is full of wonder and of mystery, even to those who know it best in summer. Nowhere else does a frosty night work such miracles in music architecture as in fixing the forms of the unceasing rush of waters. The shapes of the torrents as they fall and of the clouds of spray as they rise are alike arrested, and the roar of the water-fall is muffled, and its outline veiled as once and revealed to the frozen senses to which its motion is converted.

Not seldom in the whole channel below the falls gorged from bank to bank with the glittering masses into which the cataract has crystallized, and sometimes these heaped masses assume the form of a practicable bridge—practicable by venturesome pedestrians alone. Ice gorges are of periodic occurrence in places subject to the same conditions as Niagara, where a powerful stream is confined between high and narrow banks. Sometimes the breaking up of these by the spring floods is a source of great danger when the dam of ice forces the water above its usual level. At Port Jervis, on the Erie Railway, a long cavity is filled in rigorous winters with a vast wedge of ice, the breaking up of which is awaited by the people of the place with alarm, although the fact that it is expected has prevented any serious disasters such as occur from the unpredictable avalanches of the Alps, where the load of snow slowly accumulates through many seasons, and when its equilibrium has at last become unstable the concussion of a pistol-shot or of a shout may precipitate the whole mass upon whatever lies below.

But once or twice at Port Jervis the danger has seemed imminent enough to warrant more or less futile attempts to dislodge the gorged ice with dynamite.

Of all the "ice bridges" formed at Niagara within the memory of living men, that of this winter is said to have been the most impressive to look at. It was formed about the middle of January, and became a solid mass, or rather a close aggregation of masses, spanning the deep gorge immediately below the falls. One observer declared that it was in some places 100 feet thick; another says that it seemed to be solid from the bed of the river to a point more than fifty feet above high water mark. Hundreds of people had crossed the structure in safety. A strong westerly wind on Sunday, January 21, increased the volume of water and ice tumbling over the falls, which attacked the bridge by burrowing at its base. The water at the foot of the fall steadily rose, until at four in the afternoon a deep rumbling the end that the tremendous and increasing pressure upon the bridge had become irresistible. The centre of the great mass—itself an enormous berg—gave way, and floated slowly down stream for about 800 yards, when it brought up with a great crash against a mass already fast in that narrower gorge. The lesse ice which had been undanked above, some of it in fragments larger than a common dwelling-house, floated into the channel thus opened through the bridge, until it in turn brought up against the lower barrier. The wedging and shouldering aside of the floes by each other in the process of adjustment brought them into collision, with a continued fusillade of crashes, in which great boulders of ice went to powder, while others meeting sent jets of ice and water in the air. By dark the gorge was again a solid mass, but now nearly two miles in extent, from the foot of the falls to below the suspension-bridge. During Sunday night loose floes were hurled over the falls and thrown on the shores, destroying the observatory and dressing-rooms at "The Shadow of the Rock," and some 200 feet of the inclined railway which gives access to that place. The house of the ferryman on the Canadian side, some seventy feet above the ordinary ice-level, was battered down, giving the inmates barely time to escape. The ferry-boats themselves were destroyed, and some of the guys of the new suspension-bridge torn from the rocks to which they had been bolted. It is said that the ice bridges of the last ten years at Niagara, all put together, would not be equivalent in mass to the glacier which now occupies two miles of the bed of the river.

THE SINKING OF THE "CIMBRIA."

THE appalling disaster in the North Sea is calculated to shake the confidence of those who "go down to the sea in ships." The Cimbria was one of the largest and best of the ships of the Hamburg American line. Captain Ramm, her commander, was regarded as a very brave and skillful officer, and though a comparatively young man, was trusted by his owners on account of his coolness and energy. The vessel was not old, having been built in 1867 by the famous firm of Caird, she had seven bulk-head compartments, and was supposed to possess all the appliances for safety known to the ship-building art. Yet she went down, in fifteen minutes, in a quiet sea, carrying with her over four hundred human beings. Such an overwhelming catastrophe proves only too plainly that, with all the progress of science and mechanical ingenuity, the dangers of the ocean more than hold their own, and the thousands afloat upon its treacherous bosom run much the same risks as the men and women who set sail upon the Mayflower nearly three hundred years ago.

The Cimbria left Hamburg on the afternoon of Thursday, January 18, for New York via Havre. She is reported to have had a crew of ninety four officers and men, and four hundred and two passengers, though the numbers are variously stated, all but a score of whom were emigrants, mostly peasants from Eastern Prussia, Posen, and Russia. She ran aground before getting out of the Elbe, but soon got off without damage, and proceeded on her voyage. On Friday morning, about one o'clock, a heavy fog closed down about her when she was off the island of Borkum, on the frontier of Holland and Germany. The captain and first officer were on the bridge with the pilot. The engines were put at half speed, and subsequently again slowed, and at 2 A.M., as nearly as can be gathered from the accounts so far published, the vessel was on her proper course, going at about four knots an hour, and giving frequent fog-signals, when suddenly through the mist, only a few hundred feet distant, appeared the green lights of an approaching steamer. The helm was put to port and the engines reversed, but in less than a minute the other vessel struck the Cimbria nearly at right angles, about forty feet from the bow. The blow was like that of an armored ram. It crushed through the port side with such force as to keel the vessel over to the starboard until her decks were under water. The greater number of passengers were of course asleep. Those of them who could escape from below rushed to the deck, frantic with terror, but many others must have sunk with the ship. The captain retained his self-command, and the discipline of the crew seems to have been excellent. While the first officer held torches to light those who sought the boats, the second officer was cutting away spars and rigging for lights. Four of the eight boats were either crushed or rendered useless. The others were lowered with great difficulty, owing to the heeling of the vessel, and one of them capsized so soon as it reached the water. In a quarter of an hour all that could be done was done. The noble vessel went down in ninety feet of water, and of her precious freight only fifty-six were saved. Thirty of these escaped in one of the boats, nine in a second, and seventeen in another. The sea was covered with the dead or dying, and many who succeeded in clinging to the floating fragments perished from cold at the ice outer. The captain tried to have gone down with his vessel, as he was last seen standing at his post on the bridge, and on trustworthy tidings of his escape have been received.

The vessel which sank the Cimbria was a freight steamer, the Sultan, Captain Cuttle, from Hull to Charleston. The Sultan was of 3000 tons burden, and was heavily loaded with coals. Her captain and the crew refused to give any information as to the disaster to the agents of the press, but a statement has been made through another captain. According to this, the Sultan was going slowly, and sounding frequent signals, when the Cimbria, without warning, appeared two ship's lengths off in nearly a direct line, approaching rapidly. The latter vessel, says Captain Cuttle, changed her course and crossed the bows of the Sultan, collided with and severely injured her. He also says that he remained as near the scene as he could until eight o'clock the next morning, but heard no cries, and saw none of the passengers or crew, dead or living, from the sunken vessel. This story is, to say the least, highly improbable. A careful examination of the reported courses and positions of the two vessels immediately before and after the collision shows that no such damage as was done could have resulted from the Cimbria's striking the Sultan diagonally when the latter was going at only four knots an hour. The conflict of testimony as to the subsequent action of the Sultan is irreconcilable. If Captain says he made constant signals with lights and whistle, the Cimbria's survivors unite in saying that they heard none. The latter testify to hearing piercing cries until all the unfortunates upon the surface of the sea were silent in death; the captain of the Sultan declares that he heard no sound. The mystery which thus surrounds the conduct of the vessel which escaped from the awful collision is most painful. It is hard to believe that any sailor could have been so stony-hearted as to steam away from hundreds of his fellow-creatures crying to him from the darkness. If that can be proved against him, death would be a trifling penalty for his crime.

While the conduct of the officers and crew of the Cimbria appears to have been in every way worthy, the owners of the line have a very grave responsibility resting upon them. It is plain that there was not an adequate number of boats or rafts for the number of passengers on board; and though these which were provided proved to some extent unavailable, the lack of others remains inexcusable. It is a sad commentary upon what is commonly called the tendency of the age to the care of human life that the lives of emigrants are so recklessly risked. There is a callousness in this regard which it seems impossible to overcome, but which this last and most terrible warning ought to penetrate.

THE CINCINNATI OPERA FESTIVAL.

When they get an opera company in Cincinnati they make the most of it. We call an extended series of operatic performances an opera season; the Cincinnatians call eight operatic performances an Operatic Festival. They lay a parquet floor in Music Hall, build a proscenium and boxes, get together a chorus of two hundred voices, an orchestra of a hoof red, and the season becomes a Festival. In other respects the scheme is quite ordinary. Not only has no new work been produced, but at least three of the stock operas have been given with an ensemble that would not be tolerated here. With the exception of Madame Albani, all the leading artists have been heard in New York last season. They are, besides Madame Albani, Madame Patti, Madame Fursch-Madi, and Madame Scalchi; Signor Mierzwinski, Signor Ravelli, and Signor Galassi. These artists were the strength of the Festival, as they were of our season. No basso is included in the list. In this respect Colonel Mapleson's company is very weak. M. Duran, who sang Assur in Semiramide, has a strong voice, but it is rough in quality and poorly schooled, while Signor Monti, who sang the King in the wofully mediocre performance of Lohengrin at the Academy last season, is only a conscientious singer of the second order. There is also but one barytone in the above list—Signor Galassi. As this noble artist could not be called upon to sing at every performance, Signor Ciampi-Cellai was cast for several important parts. This singer came out of the New York season with the unqualified disapproval of audiences and critics. He is the first barytone I heard sing the cavatina in Il Trovatore without being encored.

The interest of the Festival centered in the four great artists who took part—Madame Patti, Madame Albani, Madame Scalchi, and Signor Galassi.

Madame Patti, both of whose parents were singers, was born in Madrid, February 19, 1843. "But the first language I spoke was English," she said, in an interview with the famous Vienna critic, Eduard Hanslick, "for in 1844 already our family came to New York with the impresario of the Chambers Street Opera-house." When asked if she was taken to the theatre as a child, she replied "Yes, often. Whenever my mother sang I used to get so excited over the performances that I could not sleep. When I thought all my family asleep, I got up, lit a night-lamp in front of the mirror, put on an old scarlet coat of my father's and on operatic hat of my mother's, and went through all the gestures I had caught from my mother's performance, humming over the melodies. Sometimes I got through the whole opera, and applauded myself, and threw crumpled newspapers at myself for bouquets. Once unfortunately I applauded so loudly that I woke up Carlotta, and got a scolding."

When she was seven years of age her parents, who had been left destitute by the disappearance of their manager, thought the little girl, who was always singing about the house, might prove a resource to them. So a concert was given at Tripler Hall. Standing on a table in order that people might see how small she was, Adelina sang "Casta Diva" and "Una Voce." At fifteen years of age, November 24, 1859, she appeared at the Academy of Music as Lucia. Nearly twenty-three years later, on the 6th of November last, she was heard again at the Academy in the part in which she made her début. From the ambitious débutante the hall became one of the world's most famous sopranos.

One does not criticise the nightingale's song; no more does one criticise the singing of Adelina Patti. She has long been acknowledged complete mistress of all the arts of vocalization. She might be called the Sarah Bernhardt of the operatic stage, for, like Sarah Bernhardt's acting, her singing is the apotheosis of applied art. All the dues has been calculated to a nicety, but upon every permanion she has bestowed those charms of which only one so bountifully endowed as she has command. She has the art of seeming artless, of giving to what is pure art the semblance of spontaneity. It is perhaps to the perfect ease and freedom of her singing—the total absence of effort—that the principal charm of her personations lies.

Madame Albani is a French Canadian by birth, as is shown by her maiden name, La Zetnaze. She was educated at the convent in Montreal, receiving, when twelve years of age, a gold medal for musical composition. Later her father left Montreal and came to Albany. From him she had lessons on the piano and the harp, and also in singing. His musical lessons and piano-tuning not proving as lucrative as he had hoped, and recognizing the beauty of his daughter's voice, he arranged to have her appear in a concert at Troy. In the concert the played on the piano and harp, and sang. So great was her success that she gave another concert in Albany, soon afterward. This led to her engagement as organist at St. Joseph's Church in that city. Later, the position of soprano soloist was added to her duties as organist. She also sang with the choir of the Convent of the Sacred Heart. Business chanced to bear her, and recognizing the beautiful quality of her voice, recommended a course of foreign study. As she was too poor to defray the expenses of instruction abroad, a complimentary concert was arranged for her. From the proceeds she was enabled as go to Paris, where she studied under the tenor Duprez. Afterward she studied two summers in Italy with Lamperti, through whose assistance she made her début as Amina in Malta. She sang in Italy, in Russia, and in London with great success. She appeared here in opera, under Strakosch, during the season of 1874–5. Since then she has achieved many triumphs in London and on the Continent.

Madame Sofia Scalchi, who appeared as Ortrude in Lohengrin, and Arsace in Semiramide on Thursday, was born at Turin, in 1852, of parents whose love and talent for music were very pronounced. She was precocious, and her precocity being readily traced to her parents, she was placed under Madame Boccabadati for instruction. In her sixteenth year already she appeared at Mantua, and subsequently at Naples, Milan, and Turin. Within a year thereafter Colonel Mapleson secured her services for London. Under his management she also visited the English, Scotch, and Irish cities, remaining with him another season. Then she went to St. Petersburg, where she became such a favorite that she was induced to stay there nine consecutive seasons. After that she divided her time between Moscow, Vienna, and Warsaw. Year before last she was engaged at a thousand dollars a night to sing in Rio Janeiro. Every effort was made to retain her there, but she determined to join the Mapleson company here. On the voyage the vessel was nearly ship-wrecked, and the consequences of the rough passage she was so prostrated that she was unable to appear in New York until toward the close of the season, when she was heard in Semiramide and Linda di Chamounix.

Madame Scalchi is among contralti what Madame Patti is among soprani. She has a pure, rich, large contralto voice, which, while superb in its power, is no less remarkable for its flexibility. This union of power and flexibility is rarely found in a contralto, and easily places Madame Scalchi in the foremost ranks of operatic artists.

Signor Galassi was only twelve years old when he had the pleasure of being patted on the head by Pope Pius IX., and of being called by him a "contrattinello di poima oforo." This occurred during a visit paid by Pius to Loreto, where Galassi was born in 1846. At the outbreak of the war for liberty Galassi, like his friend Campanini, joined Garibaldi's forces. His dashing bravery and genial good-fellowship made him a great favorite with his comrades. At the camp fire he used to regale them with songs and snatches of opera, which he executed to the weird light with dramatic gestures. After the war he again joined his family, which had settled in Forma. At a concert there a rich nobleman was charmed with Galassi's voice, and furnished him with the means to study at Bologna under Biagioli. A year later he made his début as the Lodi in La Straniera. Soon afterward he went with a company to Brazil, where he at first sang subordinate parts. His talent was, however, soon recognized, and at Rio he scored a brilliant success as Carlo in Ernani. From Brazil he went to Milan, where he remained until 1874, when he was engaged by Colonel Mapleson. He is one of the finest baryitones on the operatic stage. Like Madame Scalchi's contralto voice, his baryitone is flexible as well as powerful. He is, moreover, an admirable actor. His versatility is remarkable.

Signor Ravelli is an excellent tenore di grazia; he has a light, sympathetic voice, and sings easily, clearly, and purely. Signor Mierzwinski is remarkable for the fine quality of his high notes, and the passion and fervor of his singing and acting in high wrought scenes. In subdued scenes he is uninteresting and commonplace. His Arnoldo in Tell is a superb performance throughout, and his Lohengrin often rose to a high level of power. Madame Fursch-Madi is a soprano who is remarkable for the dramatic expression of her singing and her fine acting. The musical directors, Signor Ancett and Mr Otto Singer, are well known.

THE MONTREAL ICE CARNIVAL.

Montreal in winter hardly needs the aid of an ice carnival to make it attractive. Its dry, crisp atmosphere—no colder at zero than that of New York at twenty above—its garment of snow, and its gay out-of-door life present all the charm of novelty as the ordinary visitor from the States. Every turn reveals some new and picturesque situation. Snow covers the streets from house to house. If there is a city ordinance requiring the sidewalks to be cleared, it is not enforced, and one may take the chance of breaking his neck upon the icy foot-path or being run over by the dashing sleighs in the roadway. Conveyances of every kind are on runners, and sleighs to hire are as plenty and as cheap as cabs in London or Paris. One may secure a cab sleigh holding three or four persons, with driver, one horse, and fur or six buffalo-robes, for one dollar the first hour, and seventy-five cents each additional hour, and at the tremendous speed at which even the hack horses go, one may take a sufficiently long drive in an hour and a half—sufficiently long, that is, to be thoroughly chilled if he is not protected with furs and arctics against the piercing cold. No one in Montreal hesitates to wrap up. Fur is the common head covering, and a tall silk hat only exposes the wearer as derision and front-bitten more. When well wrapped, however, one may enjoy the cold and take as much pleasure in the famous drive around the Mountain as though it were midsummer, and the distant St. Lawrence were not a broad sheet of ice.

In past years relatively few Americans have seen Montreal in winter dress, and the impression has generally prevailed on the States that from November to June Canada was cold, rigorous, and uninviting. It has been to remove this mistaken notion, and to give American visitors an opportunity to become acquainted with the characteristic features of a Canadian winter, that the late ice Carnival was planned. If any one person is entitled to the credit of projecting the scheme, it is Mr. E. D. McGauley, a young Montreal lawyer and member of the Snow-shoe Club, who proposed at the annual meeting of that club last year that a week of Canadian sports should be held in the winter of 1883. The idea was taken up by the various snow-shoe, tobogganing, curling, skating, hockey, and trotting clubs, and committees were appointed to prepare a plan of operations. When these were arranged it embraced shooting and curling matches, trotting races on the St. Lawrence, snow-shoe parades and steeple-chases, tobogganing for the public, a fancy-dress skating carnival, a grand ball at the Windsor Hotel, a concert of French chansons by the Snow-shoe Club, and the construction of a building from blocks of solid ice, which should be not only a novelty in American architecture, but the most conspicuous feature of the Carnival itself.

While a glance at the palace satisfies the observer, one may linger long over his enjoyment of the Canadian sports. Of these the foremost and choicest is of course tobogan. One who has never tobogganed, even though he has seen others indulging in it, can not begin to understand its wonderful exhilaration. The sensation of plunging down a nearly perpendicular precipice at the rate of over a mile a minute, with only a quarter-inch base-wood board between one and the icy ground, and hardly as much as that, it seems, between one and eternity, is simply indescribable. One takes a long breath at the start, but it is soon gone. He gasps, and chokes, and shuts his eyes, and prays for the twenty three seconds which it takes to accomplish the descent to come to an end, and when it has come to an end he toils up to the top of the hill and tries it over again. With the second or third time he gains more breath and experience, and finds it increasingly fascinating. The toboggan is the materialized whirlwind, and it is on a under that people enjoy the sensation of riding it.

During Carnival week the private tobogganing slides have been thrown open to the public, so that visitors have had an unusually favorable opportunity to indulge in the sport. Nothing could be more animating or picturesque than the sight of one of these slides at night, lit up by Chinese lanterns and bonfires, and crowded with gay tobogganers, to whose shouts and cries the shrieks of the toboggan over the ice plays a sort of unmusical accompaniment. It is not only on the private slides, however, that the sport is practised. On the hills around the city every man in his own tobogganer, and in vacant lots, where over there is a shallowy a little longer than the toboggan itself, boys may be seen guiding its swift flight down the hill, or laboriously pulling it up after them. Accidents are not as common as one would think. The thin flexible wood readily adapts itself to the undulations in the ground, and with practice in steering one runs but few risks. As between the coasting fads of New England and the tobogan of Canada, the element of safety seems greatly in favor of the latter.

One can understand the fascinations of tobogganing, but it is less easy to account for the popularity of the snow-shoe pastime—if indeed it may be called a pastime. Why men should enjoy tramping over frozen snow with what seem to be tennis rackets flapping at their heels does not readily appear, nor is the utility of the extraordinary costume in which they get themselves up any more obvious. The snow-shoe is indispensable, no doubt, in the open country, but to employ it for amusement in the cities would seem to be making rather a toil of pleasure; and to indulge to a snow-shoe steeple-chase—if one may judge from the jaded appearance of the men at the finish of Wednesday's race—must be one of the severest of all human experiences. Notwithstanding this, however, there are eight snow-shoe clubs represented in the Carnival, which on the torch-light parade on Wednesday night turned out over one thousand devotees of the sport. A wonderfully picturesque display they made with their white blanket coats and knickerbockers, red or blue leggings, blue tasseled caps, and red bow backskin shoes, and one could not but think of the sensation which their appearance would create in New York. It would not be a bad idea for some one of the New York athletic societies to extend an invitation to its Canadian brethren to visit the metropolis during the next snow-storm. The occasion of the snow-shoe parade was made the occasion also of the inauguration of the ice palace, and the spectacle of Dominion Square illuminated by the flickering glare of the snow-shoers' torches and Bengal lights, and by the more brilliant electric rays that shone through the palace walls, presented a picture the singular beauty of which not even the thickly falling snow could dim.

Next in the grand ball at the Windsor, which took place on Friday night, and which can hardly be said as have presented any peculiarly Canadian features, the most elegant spectacle of the week was presented at the skating carnival on Thursday evening in the Victoria Rink. Whatever may be the attractions of tobogganing, curling, snow-shoeing, and the other sports, there is, after all, no more delightful exercise than skating, whether one engages in it himself or only watches the performance of others, and when the charm of music and fancy costume are added to the skater's graceful evolutions, the scene becomes indescribable in its exhilaration and picturesque effects. From such a spectacle of beauty and poetic motion the New York visitor comes away, as he does indeed from the entire Carnival celebration, with emotions of envy and regret. If the four or five days which he has spent in Montreal are a fair specimen of the Canadian winter—and there is no reason to doubt that they are—they present a strong temptation for one to exchange the penetrating New York winds and violent alternations of warmth and cold for the more equable if colder climate of the Dominion.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A young woman of Boston has written a four-act play, to be performed by seven girls. In the first act the girls talk separately. In the second and succeeding acts they all talk at once. It is difficult to understand how the play can possess sufficient merit to compensate for the glaring improbability which runs through its first quarter.

It is announced that the Emperor William intends to appoint the Prince of Wales chief of the Bluecher Hussars, as a memento of his visit to Berlin. If the Prince accepts, it will be, of course, with the tacit understanding that he is not to be expected to turn out with the boys on midsummer occasions, and march all day with a green cabbage leaf in his cap to keep off sunstroke.

A Southern newspaper ventures to hope that since one of the framers of its State Constitution has been raised to the bench, that bewildering document will get what it has never had—a satisfactory interpretation. This item contains a hint which might be utilized, perhaps, in connection with the new Penal Code of the Empire State.

It costs Ohio two dollars more per pupil to educate the rising generation than it costs Wisconsin; has the schools of the latter State do not claim to fit their graduates for the profession of holding government appointments without supplementary practical training.

The best of order prevailed in the House of Representatives during the period for which Mr. Smalls, of South Carolina, was recently called as the Speaker's chair. Being congratulated upon this fact subsequently, he said, "White men don't like to be ordered by a colored man to keep quiet."

An ingenuous Frenchman announces himself as the author of a scheme for an "oral journal." Having never attended a tea party in New England, nor spent an evening sitting on a mackerel keg in a Western village grocery, he fancies that he has hit upon something novel.

Another story of variation in the marriage ceremony comes from Louisiana, where a colored preacher is said to have asked the groom, "Will thou take this woman to be thy wedded wife, and vote for the Hon. Taylor Beattie for Congress?" The man assented, and the ceremony was completed.

The enterprising Chicago highwayman believes in keeping his advantage when once he has gained it. A Swede named Petersen was stopped to a street of that city a few nights ago by a man who demanded his money. Petersen had none to give, and the high-wayman took him into custody, marched him to a police station, and had him locked up on a charge of disorderly conduct.

SIX SOUTHERN SENATORS

THE six United States Senators from the South whose portraits are given on this page have been honored by a re-election to their high position for another term. They are all lawyers, and, with the exception of Messrs. GARLAND and SAULSBURY, have served in the Confederate army. The youngest of the group is Mr BUTLER, who is in his forty-seventh year, and the eldest, Mr SAULSBURY, who is nearly sixty-five. Between the two are Mr GARLAND, fifty-one, Mr COKE, fifty-four, Mr RANSOM, fifty-six, and Mr MORGAN, fifty-nine. Messrs. GARLAND and MORGAN were born in Tennessee, Mr COKE in Virginia, and the others in the States they represent.

Senator MORGAN has resided in Alabama since he was a boy of nine. When twenty-one years of age he was admitted to the bar, and practiced until his election to the senate. He was a Presidential Elector in 1860, and voted for BRECKINRIDGE and LANE, and a delegate in 1861 to the State Convention which passed the Ordinance of Secession. He joined the Confederate army as a private, but was promoted finally to be a brigadier-general. After the war he resumed his practice at Selma. In 1876 he was again chosen a Presidential Elector, and voted for TILDEN and HENDRICKS. One year later he was elected to the United States Senate.

Senator GARLAND's parents emigrated to Arkansas when the little fellow was scarcely a year old. The lad was educated in Kentucky, and was admitted to the bar in 1853. He was a member of the Secession Convention of his State, of the Provisional Congress at Montgomery, Alabama, in May, 1861, and subsequently of the Confederate Congress, first in the House and afterward in the Senate. In 1860 he was elected to the United States Senate, but was refused a seat. He followed his profession until 1874, when he was elected Governor of Arkansas, and two years later he was chosen Senator.

Senator SAULSBURY, of Delaware, was educated in the common and select schools and at Dickinson College. He studied and practiced law, was a member of the State Legislature in 1853 and 1854, and in 1871 took his seat in the United States Senate. In 1876 he was re-elected, and on March 4 he will enter upon still another term. Senator SAULSBURY is a man of ability, of fine presence, and polished manners.

Senator RANSOM received an academic education, was graduated from the University of North Carolina when twenty-one years of age, and soon afterward was admitted to the bar. He was a planter as well as a lawyer. He was Attorney-General for his State from 1852 to 1854, a member of the Legislature from 1858 to 1860, and a Peace Commissioner to the Congress of Southern States in 1861. He has been in the United States Senate continuously from April 24, 1872. A recent writer says of him: "In scholarship, taste, and culture he has had no superior in the history of his State, while as an advocate he is eloquent, powerful, and a consummate master of the effective weapons found in raillery and invective. Like Athenian CIMON, who was equally victorious on sea and land, General RANSOM has shone in such various fields of action that it is difficult to determine his merit to any one." The degree of LL.D was conferred on him by his alma mater, the North Carolina University, a few years ago.

Senator BUTLER received a classical education at the Edgefield Academy, and afterward an incomplete course at the South Carolina College. He studied law at Stoneland, and began practice in his twenty-first year. Three years later he was chosen a member of the State Legislature, was a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor in 1850, and in 1877 became the successor of Mr BONHAM in the United States Senate.

Senator COKE did not remove from Virginia to Texas until he had been graduated at William and Mary College and admitted to the bar. He has since practiced law constantly when not in the public service. He joined the Confederate army as a private, and afterward was made a captain. In 1865 he was appointed District Judge, and the following year was chosen Judge of the State Supreme Court, but was removed by General SHERIDAN as "an impediment to reconstruction." In 1867 he returned to the practice of the law. He was made Governor of Texas in 1873 by 50,000 majority, and in 1876 was re-elected by 102,000 majority. Two months later he was elected to the United States Senate, and in the following December he resigned his seat as Governor to take his new position. He is said to be a man of great executive ability.

THE ADVERTISEMENTS OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP

WHICH LATELY APPEARED IN "HARPER'S WEEKLY"

Have been the means of attracting the attention of thousands of Intelligent families who have taken advantage of the extraordinary offer of sending the Soap by mail for trial:—

Thousands of letters have already been received from Subscribers of HARPER'S WEEKLY who having made the required promises, have each received in return a cake of The Frank Siddalls Soap, in accordance with the most liberal offer ever made to the public.

Although it is very expensive to send the Soap out for trial this way, it is believed to be the cheapest and quickest way of getting it introduced, AND THE OFFER IS STILL OPEN TO THOSE WHO HAVE NOT YET WRITTEN.

THIS ADVERTISEMENT IS NO HUMBUG OR IT WOULD NOT BE ALLOWED IN THIS PAPER

And remember, The Frank Siddalls Soap is here publicly guaranteed to do everything claimed for it in this advertisement, and positively contains nothing to injure the most tender skin, the most delicate colors, or the finest fabrics

And is a Godsend to Housekeepers and Servant Girls

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the Skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Hurry unless to secure or has to be carried far, remember that with
The Frank Siddalls Cup of Washing, a few bubbles are suffer are enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints beautifully Brightened!
A girl of 13 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes—It is the only Soap that leaves the dishes Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from pots and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag that blurs your tableware, it is not their fault, for you have given them soap made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish-rag. Use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

No have to the Housekeeper's Chance!
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE-CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paint, Woodwork and Mirrors, Wine glasses, Goblets, and all Glass Vessels, ordinary soap, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass; while The Frank Siddalls Soap is the most elegant thing for this purpose that can be used.

For Washing Bed-clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing Utensils used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat or be troubled with sores of any kind when nothing but The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, its ingredients being so pure and mild.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—dont even scald them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease, and without wearing a scratch; the soap does not have to be rinsed off

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Author at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army, and the Navy, will all reap great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting Lather is no different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost immediate, the lather never leaves or smarts, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how closely shaved, and the Shaving and Soap Cup will always be most soothing.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce, remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing a dog, flea, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and restoring it soft and pliable, while for washing, wax and for stables, cleaning the running gear and bodies of fine carriages, it is without a rival. By its use paint and varnish will last longer and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

IT IS ELEGANT for washing Printers' Rollers, for washing the Ink from Type, Electrotypes, etc., and for washing Printing Ink from the hands.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient, its importance is becoming more and more widely known and appreciated, and it is rapidly superseding Imported Castile and similar soaps for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE-NAIL

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing old Bleeding Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns; for washing Unhealthy places as Infants and Adults; for use by persons suffering with Salt-Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face, and for children afflicted with Scaly Incrustations, it is without one of the injurious effects so often experienced where any other Soap is used, while for washing the invalid it is a most valuable aid to the Physician, by the thoroughness with which it removes the putrefactions from the skin that would otherwise tend to counteract the action of his medicine by closing up the pores, and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, began no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for washing sores on the feet, caused by walking or wearing tight shoes,
Always leave plenty of the lather on—dont rinse the lather off.
For washing Graduate Measures and Mortars it is better than anything else

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All perfumes are injurious to the skin: The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients, that is almost a pleasant vein to be inhaled. It never leaves any odor on the Skin the hose never has any of the unpleasant glaze that other soaps produce; it should also not be used for washing the hands and face of children, as happens like—a child will not rinse! Instead of face washed when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, as it does not cause the eyes to smart with the devoted intense zeal that even Imported Castile Soap causes. It leaves the skin Soft and Smooth.

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it.
A little on the tooth-brush makes the mouth feel and gums perfectly clean.
It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath, and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted for hotel use with the hard water of the East and to Lake-water

Persons who despise a musty sponge or washcloth will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Whenever either a Sponge or wash-rag has a disagreeable smell, it is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soap that is such a favorite with people to use. The Frank Siddalls Soap with its natural and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any necessity to expose it to the air of sun.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing; plenty of the rich, white lather should be left in the hair (not washed out), it entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic, Bay Rum, Dandelion, Pomade, or any hair dressing. I tell this way it removes dandruff, the hair will not collect dust, and there will not be any Itching of the Scalp.—Cant Collars, Hot Cloths and Neck wear will keep clean much longer. The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior to Benzine or Ammonia for cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing grease spots, etc., and is guaranteed not to injure the garment.

ODD USES—QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

Eminent Physicians claim that skin diseases, such as Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., are caused by Soap made from rancid grease. use The Frank Siddalls Soap and avoid all such troubles.

Artificial Teeth and Artificial Eyes will retain their original brilliancy and polished when kept washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap.

It washes telescope lenses and Photographers' plates without a possibility of scratching them, while it is being used with the most gratifying results in Schools of Design, for washing brushes used by the students.

The hands of those at farm work, when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, will soon clear from hacking corn, driving teams, and other unbleach employment, but of course no house-soda or other Soap must even Castile must be used.

Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles

Wash your Dog with The Frank Siddalls Soap; leave plenty of the lather in his hair, and you will be surprised at the improvement. A dog washed occasionally with this Soap will be quite free to trouble from fleas. Use it for taking grease spots out of kid carpets and for cleaning rug carpets. Use it for wiping off oilcloths, linoleum, etc.—IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT, and they will last much longer

Use it for cleaning garments of every description. It is better than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning clothing, and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

Miss Fanc and all Miss Flossies when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be as clean and sweet as new, and do not require scalding or putting in the sun.

HOW A LADY CAN GET SOAP TO TRY

At Places where it is Not Sold at the Stores.

Send the retail price 10 cents in money or Postage Stamps
Say she saw the advertisement in HARPER'S WEEKLY
Only send for the Cake, and make these 2 promises

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first week day after receiving it, and that every day in the family wash shall be done with it

Promise No. 2—That the person washing will personally see that the printed directions for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular 10-cent cake of Soap will be sent, postage prepaid. It will be packed by a proof that will be sure to make it safely safely, and 10 cents in Postage Stamps will be put on

All this is done for 10 cents because it is believed to be a cheaper way to introduce it than to send customers to sell it to the stores

If your letter gets to attention, it will be because you have NOT made the promises, or have sent for more than one cake.

Make the promises very plain of the Soap will NOT be sent
A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister if the above TWO promises are made.

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

A Person of Refinement will be glad to accept a new, easy clean way of washing clothes, in place of the old, hard, sloppy way

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

A Person of Intelligence will have no difficulty in understanding and following the very easy and sensible Directions.

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

A Person of Honor will scorn to do or assist a thing as to buy the Soap and not follow directions as strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

Sensible Persons will feel thankful and will not get mad when new and improved ways are brought to their notice

And now dont get the old washboiler mended, but next wash-day give one hearty trial to The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for;
but after trying it, dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses to accommodate you, or you can order direct from the Factory

You must NOT send for more than one cake;
if a second cake is sent by the MOST careful and conscientious

Act Now for the Clean, Neat, Cool, Genteel, Ladylike, FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing thirteen about these directions—any child over 13 years of age who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them.

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used, NOT EVEN TO HEAT THE WASH WATER, and as the wash-water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the mineral-ness, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle TWO FIRST TIME, as we have said it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the hot water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and clothes that have been overheated in washing will smell on skin drying, and the clothes will lose easier

Always discard a small piece of Soap in the church; it washes the evening sweater, and the clothes handkerchief.

The Frank Siddalls Soap makes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compounds; dont use Borax. A new idea—the Soap is all to be used.

FIRST—Rip one of the garments in a tub of lukewarm water, draw it out on a wash board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to waste it, being particular not to miss soaping any of the soiled places.

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as a piece to rolled when in is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash board and the dirt will come out; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DON'T use any more Soap, DON'T SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DON'T wring them, but hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 30 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE the BRIGHTER

HALE'S HONEY.

ONE of the best and most reliable remedies for Throat and Lung Affections is found in the old-established and well-known remedy Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. This is especially the case in localities where there are young children, as a dose administered upon the first symptoms of Croup will not only speedily relieve the little sufferer but, by causing free expectoration, prevent the formation of the false membrane, which is at once the terror of physicians and the despair of parents. This remedy should always be kept in the house as it may sometimes save the lives of little ones when no physician is within call. Ask your Druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. Call name, and take no substitute.

BETWEEN TWO FIRES.

A SHREWD observer in Washington says that leading Republicans believe, with reason, that when the Democratic party comes face to face with the tariff it will break up. However this may be, nothing is more evident than the reluctance of both parties in Congress to deal decisively with the question of revision of the tariff. The reason is obvious. It is that neither of the existing parties was formed upon the tariff issue, and that Democratic protectionists and Republican revenue reformers are each equally doubtful of the general effect upon their party of pressing their particular views. Still further difficulties arise from the want of agreement upon details even among those whose general views are in accord. Protectionist sentiment ranges all the way from the highest to the lowest rates, and the opposing doctrine stretches from free trade to a well-considered revenue tariff. Each side tests the position of the other by logical extremes, and the specific clause or duty under discussion at any moment offers an irresistible temptation to debate of the abstract question. Meanwhile the air of the capital rings with charges and counter-charges of corruption and lobby. The agents of this and that American monopoly actively canvassing members are held up to public scorn by one side, and the representatives of foreign manufactures striving for the American market are ruthlessly denounced by the other. Imposing statistics total to protection are encountered by tremendous figures destructive of free trade. And amid the universal uproar of contention it is gratifying to remark that the sole purpose which animates either side, if we may trust the orators, is the welfare of the people, and especially of the manual laborer, who in the ardor of debate is sometimes described by the politician as belonging to the working classes, forgetting that in this country "classes" are not acknowledged.

It is a safe conclusion, when two armies are evidently unwilling to fight, that there will be no battle. When the two parties in Congress are uncertain whether they wish to pass a bill, the bill will not be passed. It might, indeed, be predicted with certainty that the tariff will not be revised at this session except for one consideration, and that is the attitude of the country. Precisely what the elections meant must be, of course, a matter of inference. Of one meaning, however, Congress was very sure, and that was that they meant some kind of reform in the civil service. There is a very general conviction that they meant also a reduction of taxation. The public feeling in regard to the River and Harbor Bill was unmistakable. It was believed to be a vast system of [illegible]ance, and an extravagance made practicable by an overflowing Treasury. Extravagance and corruption go together. Honesty and economy must be secured by diminishing the revenue. Then is the dilemma—that action is felt to be necessary, but that neither party is ready for action. [illegible] calculate its party effect. Few Republicans would be ready to join the Democratic party in revenue reform when the Democratic party holds no position upon the subject, and [illegible] who desire protection would join the Democratic party to secure it so long as Republicans [illegible] question. It is as foolish to treat the Democratic party as a legatee of the Hero [illegible] regard the Democrats as holding [illegible] ANDREW JACKSON. MR. RANDALL is a free-trader. But Mr. RANDALL's prospects of the Democratic Speakership are very promising.

The responsibility of present action, however, rests with the Republican party. There is unquestionably a general expectation that the revenue will be reduced, and if it is not reduced, the Republicans will be justly held to account. It is equally plain that no sweeping change of principle or method is demanded. In the present condition of the country and in the present state of public sentiment the Democratic party would not dare to contest the election of 1884 upon the total overthrow of a tariff. It is a wise and fair administration of that system, without violent changes and with the purpose of reducing taxation and preventing a surplus, which is the reasonable public expectation. And it is by that administration, as shown in the action of Congress, that parties will be judged. While it is true that both sides are very reluctant to do anything, it is obvious that something must be done. In this position could a Republican Congress do better than follow the general recommendations of the Republican President, in his annual Message, so far as the tariff is concerned? His proposal to repeal all the internal taxes except those upon distilled spirits was indeed too sweeping, and not in accord, it seems to us, with the sound general principle of taxation that he laid down. But his recommendations of a considerable reduction of the duties on iron, steel, cotton, and silk goods, wool and woollens, sugar and molasses, with a liberal enlargement of the free list, are wise and feasible suggestions. The Secretary of the Treasury also recommended immediate and extensive reductions of the revenue. The abstract question of protectism is not under discussion. Assuming the present general system of indirect taxation, the Republican Congress must reduce the taxes, or the Republican party will pay the penalty.

A BILL TO BE WATCHED.

THE bill called the Freedom of Worship Bill which has been offered in the New York Legislature is an attempt to introduce the teaching of a specific religious creed into certain State institutions. It is in direct contradiction of the non-sectarian policy of those institutions, and is designed to give one sect an ascendency which is not enjoyed by others. No doctrinal or denominational teaching should be authorized in public institutions, while of course ministers of all denominations, within necessary regulations, should enjoy equal rights of visitation. There is no State Church, and religious liberty is infringed by any State preference of religious denominations.

Every effort to circumvent the absolutely non-sectarian policy of the State, however specious and plausible, should be resolutely resisted and baffled. The wise rule that religious teaching in public institutions shall be non-sectarian is opposed as irreligious, just as the public schools in which some form of religious faith is not taught are denounced as "godless."

But there is no sounder American principle than that the public schools and public institutions of every kind shall be non-sectarian, and the Roman Catholic body is the only religious denomination which, as such, shows itself steadily hostile to this fundamental condition of equal rights.

HOW TO COMPLETE THE NEW CAPITOL.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND has wisely decided to introduce some system into the expenditures for the new Capitol. More than $14,000,000 of "the people's money" has been expended upon this vast building, and the end is not yet. Governor ROBINSON would not countenance it in any way, and although on the evening of the formal opening he was officially present, it was but for a very short time, and he passed through the building with the air of a man who washed his hands of the whole business. Comptroller WADSWORTH also called attention to the vast cost and the doubtful security of the structure. A special Commission recommended taking down the ceiling of the Assembly Chamber. The Court of Appeals refuses to occupy the room designed for it. The grand staircase is the finest upon the continent, and painfully dark. The predominant impression of the new Capitol is that of immense cost and immense waste, of immense helplessness upon the part of the public, and immense negligence upon the part of the Legislature.

The only consolation yet offered for all this cost and waste is the praise bestowed upon the building by Mr. FREEMAN, the English historian. But he praises its noble effect, which was sure to be produced by any massive building upon so noble a site. He does not praise the extravagance and the general shiftlessness and aimlessness which have distinguished its erection. A bill has passed the Assembly to remedy these, at least, for the remainder of the expense and the building, by an actually responsible direction. The present Commission is composed of certain State officers. It is an ex officio board, and an ex officio board has not been generally found to be the best device for securing economy and satisfaction in any enterprise. So far as can be learned, there has been no plan of limiting expense by defining the general style of construction. Vast sums of money—hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars—have been lavished upon rare marbles, Mexican alabaster, mahogany for wainscotings and ceilings, and every kind of luxurious decoration. There is little reason to suspect enormous jobbery, frauds, and thefts in the building. It is only this reckless extravagance which is deplorable.

New York is a great State, undoubtedly, and a rich State, and magnificence in public works is an agreeable spectacle. But New York is a republican State, and republican government, or government by the people, should commend itself not only by its reasonableness and its care of liberty, but by its simplicity and economy. Splendid extravagance does not become a republican State. No man would venture to say that the people of New York would have voted to pay fifteen or twenty millions of dollars for a State-house. This is not because they are mean, but because they are wise, and it is the duty of the Legislature to act in accordance with what every member knows to be the public feeling upon the subject. It is late to begin to do what ought to have been done at first. The Capitol must be completed, but it should be completed upon a close estimate of the probable cost, and under an intelligent and responsible director.

REFORM IN THE STATE.

SINCE the PENDLETON bill passed Congress similar bills have been introduced into several State Legislatures, notably in New York and Pennsylvania. In New York the measure presented is substantially the Congressional bill applied to the State. It provides for a Commission whose duties are to be like those of the national Commission, and within four months after the expiration of the present session of the Legislature the subordinate officers and clerks in the State service are to be classified, under the direction of the Governor: but the classification is not to include elective officers, nor, except by request of the Senate, persons nominated for confirmation, nor laborers. The bill also empowers the mayors of all cities with a population of fifty thousand or more to prescribe proper regulations for the admission and promotion of persons in the municipal service. From this provision are excepted elective officers, and the police, health, fire, educational, or law departments of any city, and responsible financial officers. All such departments, however, are invested with such authority for their own regulation as the bill confers upon the mayor, to be exercised in consultation with him. The bill also stringently prohibits political assessments.

Like the PENDLETON bill, this is an imitative measure. It does not seek at once to include everything, but it selects a certain area within which it is to operate, and within which it may be carefully tested. It is properly tentative, and seeks the correction of experience at every step. It is but fair that a new system should be satisfactorily tested before it is universally applied, and it can be tested satisfactorily only under the careful supervision which is practicable within a limited range. For such reasons the operation of the bill passed by Congress is restricted at the outset. That bill, for instance, will apply at first to about thirty post-offices only, including those at Boston and Providence in New England; New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore in the Middle States; Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, and St. Paul at the West, New Orleans at the South, and San Francisco upon the Pacific. In these offices it can be fairly tried, and satisfactory results in them would lead naturally to its extension to others. The same principle is applied to municipalities in the bill which has been introduced at Albany.

The Legislature will hardly forget that the popular demand for reform, which was so promptly heeded by Congress, was nowhere more emphatic and impressive than in New York. And in this State, which has inherited its civil service system from the Council of Appointment, nothing remains to be learned of the evils of a wholly political and partisan minor service. The vote of both parties in the Legislature will be curiously watched, and every vote for obstruction and delay will be seen to be a vote against a just and general popular demand.

THE FATHER OF CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

THE passage of the civil service reform bill naturally recalls a man who would have justly rejoiced in it—THOMAS ALLEN JENCKES, of Rhode Island. MR. JENCKES is the father of the movement, and the PENDLETON bill merely embodies his principles and purposes. MR. SUMNER introduced a bill in 1864 providing for competitive examinations, which LINCOLN thought would be bitterly opposed, and which MR. SUMNER did not press. In 1871 he said that the first essential step to reform was a single term for the Presidency, and he proposed a constitutional amendment to that effect. But the continuous movement which has now resulted in the passage of the reform bill began with MR. JENCKES. In obedience to a concurrent resolution of July 12, 1865, MR. JENCKES, then a Representative from Rhode Island, brought in a report on the 31st of January, 1867, from the joint select committee on retrenchment. The report was accompanied by a bill establishing a Department of the Civil Service, and providing for competition and probation. This report was followed by another on the 25th of May, 1868, and both were accompanied with a great body of evidence upon the condition and system of the civil service, together with ample information regarding foreign systems, and especially of the reformed methods there recently introduced in England. Mr. JENCKES argued, maintained, illustrated, and defended his recommendations in many speeches and against all comers with great readiness, ability, and adroitness. He came to New York in January, 1869, and in an admirable address to an audience of conspicuous and influential citizens he produced a very decided impression, and gave definite form to a growing conviction.

But the subject seemed to be too remote and speculative until General GRANT, upon his first election, saw the extreme pertinence of Mr. JENCKES's suggestion to the actual situation, and with the aid of Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House, and of Mr. ARMSTRONG, of Pennsylvania, Mr. JENCKES succeeded in attaching an amendment to the Civil Appropriation Bill, which is now Section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the appointment of persons to devise regulations to promote the efficiency of the civil service. It was in pursuance of this action that General GRANT appointed the Commissions of 1871, which reported to him a general scheme that he recommended to Congress. During the consultations of this body the members were in constant communication with Mr. JENCKES, who placed at their disposal his valuable correspondence with the English Commissioners, and they had the benefit of his suggestions and criticisms at every step. When the constitutional question regarding the action of the Commissions was suggested by one of the members, and was referred by the President to the Attorney-General, an able and elaborate letter of Mr. JENCKES was of great service to the Attorney-General in the determination of the question.

Public opinion, however, was not yet ripe; Congress and party managers were hostile; and after a brief struggle General GRANT abandoned the effort for reform. But the question was too vital and important to be set aside. The discussion in the press and the general awakening of public opinion continued. In the autumn and winter of 1869 the moribund Civil Service Reform Association of New York was revived, followed immediately by the formation of other associations in all parts of the country, and by the organization of the National League in 1881. Documents were issued and addresses delivered under the auspices of all the associations, and the powerful aid of many of the chief journals in the country was given to the movement. In the winter of 1869-70, the bill which has now passed Congress was framed by the New York Association, in accordance with Mr. JENCKES's general views, and with the scheme recommended by the Commission in 1871. While the public interest in the subject was rapidly increasing, the murder of President GARFIELD immediately concentrated universal attention upon it. Reform then became a general demand, which the Humane assessments made at once imperative. Upon the meeting of Congress the Senate took up the bill. It was cordially supported by the leading Senators of both parties, and at its passage only five votes were recorded against it. In the House it was referred without delay, and the committee was authorized to report at any time. Putting aside his own bill, the chairman reported the Senate bill at the earliest moment. It was immediately put upon its passage, and to prompt obedience to the emphatic demand of the country the measures which Mr. JENCKES substantially originated, and to which he devoted himself with unselfish assiduity, has become law.

THE STATE COMMISSIONER OF LUNACY.

In speaking of the existing and responsible agencies by which the Legislature could undertake investigations into the condition and management of State charitable institutions we mentioned the State Board of Charities. For the specific purpose which we were discussing, that of an inquiry into the lunatic asylums, the obvious resort would seem to be to the State Commissioner of Lunacy. Dr HARMAN, an officer whose competency is conceded, and part of whose duty it is to know the exact condition of the institutions, and to report upon them intelligently.

The agents whom the State appoints to perform certain duties may be incompetent or untrustworthy, and it may be necessary to put them aside and ascertain the truth. But it is not necessary to assume that agents who are appointed especially for their fitness are unfit, nor that a committee of the Legislature can ascertain what is hidden from an expert. If a committee of investigation into the management of the State lunatic asylums is to be appointed, it might wisely begin its inquiry by consulting the State Commissioner of Lunacy and the State Board of Charities.

FIRE PROOF HOTELS.

A LETTER from Milwaukee states that it is a mistake to describe the Newhall House as a death trap because of intricate corridors and difficulty of finding the way. The writer very justly says that the catastrophe was so tragical that the precise facts should be clearly understood, and not misrepresented, if proper means are to be taken to prevent such disasters hereafter.

The house was built around no open court, with straight corridors, and with free fire-escapes on each floor, and a bridge across the alley. So far as the corridors alone were concerned there was no trouble. But there were few brick walls above the office floor. It was a huge wooden tenement, with a dozen or more shops in the basement, and it was instantly filled with smoke, so that many of those who were nearest the fire-escapes perished. A person in a room on the fifth floor, next to a fire-escape, was lost, and the occupant of the room over it, upon the sixth floor, was saved. Fire-proof walls, however, would not have availed for safety, nor could anything have been of use to corridors filled with suffocating smoke.

For some reason, however, the Newhall House had a bad name. It was stated—nor have we seen it denied—that the insurance companies regarded it on a peculiarly dangerous risk. We can see no objection to a requirement that hotels shall be made as nearly fire-proof as possible. Brick walls, iron girders, floors laid in cement, are illustrations of what might be required. It is conclusively proved that the safety of the public can not be intrusted to private enterprise in building hotels and theatres, and it will be a great public gain if some of the original cost can be diverted from flimsy extravagance of decoration, which increases the peril, to solid fire-proof construction. There is not a tawdriest luxurious hotel in the city of New York, for instance, which could compete with a well-furnished and plain hotel which was known to be as truly fire-proof as some other well-known buildings as the city. The Herald truly says that what is wanted is not patent fire-escapes, but fire-proof buildings.

EAU-DE MORT.

THE Christian Union recently published some interesting letters from eminent gentlemen upon the best methods of dealing with intemperance. The discussion must receive a marked impetus from the situation in Switzerland, which as the more striking because Europe has been constantly cited as an illustrations of sobriety without restrictive law. A letter to the London Times, full of interesting details, states that drunkenness is becoming a national peril in Switzerland. The public fortune is compassioned by the rapid growth of the evil habit. Failures and forced sales of property, due to this cause, have so increased that land is depreciating in value, and it is difficult for mortgagees to find buyers or tenants. The associated mayors in the Bernese Jura have addressed themselves upon the subject to the cantonal government. The Church synods loudly condemn intemperance. The societies of public utility and the press are contending with the evil, and the National Assembly has directed the Department of the Interior to see what can be done by restrictive legislation.

The increase of drunkenness dates from 1874, when the cantons were deprived of the power of regulating the traffic in drink. Before that time it was subject to many and stringent restrictions. Now it is on free on the trade in bread and meat. As a result of the removal of the restrictions, the number of public-houses or drinking shops has risen from 47,807 in 1870 to 21,738 in 1880. The population has increased by six per cent., the drinking shops by twenty-two. Deducting women, children, and the sick, the average number of drinking shops is one to every thirty persons. In Geneva they are so numerous as all other shops together. In parts of the country forty to sixty per cent. of all the crimes can be traced to the habit of drink.

More than all other evils which the general steam-drinking produces is the waste of wages and time. Some curious figures are given from the account-books of liquor-sellers. One man earned in a week 23 francs 60 centimes, and spent 20 francs 5 centimes for drink, thus carrying home 3 francs 55 centimes—say seventy cents—for his week's wages. One week the book of a liquor-seller, who was also a contractor, showed that his men had drank up more than their wages, and began the next week with a balance against them. The remedy for this alarming evil in the cantons of the constitution, and the restoration to the cantons of the regulation of the traffic. The facts are a significant evidence of the value of its careful restriction.

PERSONAL.

DURING his visit to this city the Marquis of Lorne bought for the Princess Louise a duplicate of a gold bracelet on exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum. It is a simple band of gold, the ends of which are clasped by lions' heads. The original came from Cyprus, and duplicates of it are said to be owned by the Princess BEATRICE and by the two daughters of the Duke of Argyll.

—The Women's Insurance and Accident Company of New York City is an organization that owes its existence to the fact that the old and prosperous insurance companies discriminate very unfavorable against women. Mr GEORGE W. PHILLIPS, actuary of the Equitable Life-Insurance Company, having had his attention called to this outrage, replied: "Women are bad risks. We take them, but we don't want them, though, singularly enough, when it comes to annuities, the women display a perverse habit of living on and on, so that from any point of view they are bad risks. A wife insured for the benefit of her husband is not liked as a risk."

—Once a year Somnia opens its doors to men. Among its guests on the 20th of January last were the Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, Dr. J. P. NEWMAN, and Mr. JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

—In a paper read recently before the Nineteenth Century Club, Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE told of a learned Boston lawyer who said, "I can neither read nor understand Emerson, but my daughters can."

—Mr. FROUDE says that Cardinal NEWMAN's supreme merit as a talker when at Oxford was that he never tried to be witty or to say striking things. Ironical he could be, but not ill-natured. Not a malicious anecdote was ever heard from him. Irony he could not be. He was lightness itself—the lightness of elastic strength.

—Mr. J. COTTER MORISON, the biographer of MACAULAY, declares that when the historian was a guest of Lady HOLLAND at Holland House the imperious mistress scolded, flattered, and caressed him with a patronizing condescension that could not have been to every person's taste.

—Few men (according to the Athenæum) living wholly in the atmosphere supposedly serene of art have stirred more personal affection than DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI, or roused in late years less personal antagonism. Those most opposed to his views in art found in a man who mingled in an ateliér, shared perceptibly in on competition, and bid for no prize, no foul for their animosity, and allowed it to expire.

—DEAN BRADLEY is to publish a volume of Recollections of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, ARTHUR TROLLOPE's one an autobiographical memoir left by the novelist, and ROBERT BROWNING a new collection of poems, under the title Asolando.

—Professor HUXLEY's connection with Cambridge University, England, has become closer. He will deliver one of the regular courses of lectures there this year, and will act as an elector to the professorships of Anatomy and Physiology.

—The widow of General "Stonewall" JACKSON and her daughter, a young lady of nineteen, now reside at Cleveland, Ohio. Mrs. JACKSON left the South because she was there compelled to mingle with society, and could not find the retirement and rest that her health demanded.

—FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE thinks that a good actor can not also be a good dramatic critic, and introduces Mrs. SIDDONS, Miss RACHEL, and PASTA as cases in point.

—The phenomenal child called GRAD, now being exhibited at the Royal Aquarium, London, as the long-sought-for missing link between man and monkey, is pronounced by a writer in the Academy to be distinctly human, possessing the faculty of articulate speech, and endowed with an average share of intelligence. Her low forehead is covered with ink-black hair, with which also her whole body is overgrown, though the coating is not thick or long enough to conceal the dark olive-brown color of the skin. Her nose is short and snubby flat, her feet are prehensile, like an ape's, and her hands can bend back over the wrists. "Her beautiful round black eyes are very large, and perfectly horizontal."

—Says the London Spectator: "President GARFIELD did not die altogether in vain. CHARLES GUITEAU in killing him in 'Stalwart' interest gave a deadly wound to the system of patronage which the 'Stalwart' party were trying to protect. The crime fixed the attention of the people on the 'wire-pullers,' whose desire for patronage was the original cause, and it was silently decided throughout the Union that their trade should cease."

—"H. M. his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., G.C.B., having been appointed a "Personal Aide-de-Camp" to Queen VICTORIA in recognition of his services during the Egyptian war, the London Spectator finds it "impossible not to smile." Suppose, it asks, President LINCOLN, after the surrender of Richmond, to have rewarded General GRANT by appointing him "My First Usher," or "My Chief Orderly," what would the world have said? "The laughter would have been endless."

—Mr. SAMUEL J. GIFT has, as usual, made the sensation of the Artists' Fund Exhibition. His contribution this year, representing a handsome young mother saying "Rock" to an unseen intender who might awaken her infant in its cradle, is a piece of strictly scientific drawing and exquisitely tender sentiment.

—Mr. J. CARROLL BECKWITH has distinguished himself as the Committee on Decoration for the Water-color Exhibition. The galleries of the Academy, with their Japanese portières, background, and brick-a-brac groups, excite the admiration of those who appreciate fitness in ornamentation.

—M. BONNAT, the French painter, who went to Villa d'Avray to make a sketch of the dead GAMBETTA, spoke afterward with much earnestness of the inartistic and disorderly manner in which the statesman had been lodged.

—Says the London Academy: "We have never read a more encouraging report than that just issued by President GILMAN, of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. Only next after teaching and study is the duty of publication. In the respect Johns Hopkins may claim to be doing better work than any other institution in the world." It publishes regularly a Journal of Mathematics, a Chemical Journal, and a Journal of Philology.

—Lady WILDE, (OSCAR's mother) congratulates her countrywomen that, owing to recent British legislation, "the whole social and legal position of the sex is changed. From this time forth a woman enters the married state no longer as a bond slave, disfranchised of all rights over her fortune, but equal with her husband before the law as regards property, free from his control, and perfectly independent of him in respect to the use she makes of her fortune." She adds that "women have been so long politically non-existent that they almost tremble to assert they have any rights apart from their husbands." They require, she declares, "much training in habits of self-assertion and self reliance."

We can not see it, for the reason that dry goods and legitimate drama are almost synonymous terms."

—Mr. RUSKIN having been re-elected to the Slade Professorship of Art at Oxford, probably, says the Pall Mall Gazette, will be delighted to hear of it. "Genius is not an over-common quality in the occupants of professorial chairs, and any academical body would do itself honor by accepting a man like Mr RUSKIN on his own terms. The wide circle of Mr RUSKIN's readers outside the university, in England and America, will be equally pleased. His acceptance of the chair is a sign of his restoration to health."

—"Whether we like the fact or not," says an English journalist, "a very large number of women have now to make their own way in life; and surely it is only fair that if they must compete with men, they shall receive in youth the kind of instruction which will prepare them for their future struggles."

—A breath of the war period stirs at the mention of the name of Colonel HARRY GILMOR, ex-guerrilla chieftain and free-lance of the Confederate army, who is now living in Baltimore of necessity of the law. The writer of this paragraph will soon forget being a passenger on an express train from Washington to Philadelphia in the summer of 1864, when the redoubtable colonel and a detachment of cavalry captured the train just north of [illegible] ordered the passengers to leave it, took prisoner every man wearing the Federal uniform, set fire to the cars, and backed them over a long bridge of trestle-work which they had crossed a minute before, and which, in its turn, was also soon ablaze. Most of the victims were treated with the greatest consideration, but the Union soldiers on board, some of whom, poor fellows, had been ill with typhoid fever, and were going home to convalesce, were marched off to Richmond. The contents of the baggage-cars received a thorough examination, and the colonel soon cut a droll figure in walking nonchalantly among his prisoners with a large new tooth-brush thrust through a button-hole on the breast of his coat. A considerable feeling on the part of the loyal passengers was aroused by the affection displayed by several of the ladies, who hung upon the necks of the rebel soldiers, and loudly deplored their delight at seeing them. Toward evening a tug-boat came up and took the most of us to Philadelphia, where these demonstrative [illegible] unfortunately soon found themselves in the hands of the United States Provost Marshal.

MOTHER LOVE IN HEAVEN.

Once I met a little child astray
In the wet and windy winter street
He'd been wandering the long, cold day.
Oh, so weary were his little feet!

But a baby of four summers old,
In a small straw hat and cotton dress,
"What's the matter, little one?" "I'm cold."
"Where's mamma?" "She's gone away, I guess.

"I've been looking for her all the day.
Oh, I'm 'fraid she'll never come again!"
Then the pent-up anguish had its way,
And the baby's tears fell down like rain.

Once he had been shielded safe and warm,
A pet nestling in a happy nest,
Dreaming not of cold or pain or harm,
In the shelter of a mother's breast.

Now he had but cold and hireling care.
No one missed him from his little place;
No one taught him childhood's holy prayer;
No one kissed his patient, pleading face.

Oh, clasp tenderly the little hands
That no mother's hand again shall hold.
Do not doubt his Angel pleading stands
Mother-love in Heaven well and grows cold.

Be afraid to wrong the motherless:
They have guards invisible but strong.
They have pleaders in their sore distress,
That will right, with mighty hand, their wrong.

WESTWARD BOUND.

THE bare statistics of immigration to the United States are sufficiently imposing. During what is termed the last fiscal year—which very conveniently ends on the 30th of June — nearly [illegible] immigrants arrived in this country. The [illegible] was 788,992. Whence did this [illegible] set out for the peaceful invasion of the American republic? The greatest percentage from any one nation was from the mother country—179,423, or 22.74 per cent., while 98,293, or 12 26 per cent. more, came from Canada, making 35 per cent from the English speaking race. Of these 82,394 were from England, 76,452 from Ireland, and 10,907 from Scotland. The proportion from Ireland is the greatest, regard being had to the population from which they were drawn. Almost [illegible] these immigrants were of a high [illegible] apparent character, in strength of [illegible] and in equipment for their new life, the [illegible] exception being among the Irish. Next in the order of numbers came the Germans, a quarter of a million strong (250,630), forming 31 78 per cent. of the whole. These too were of excellent average character. From these generally kindred sources almost precisely two-thirds of the immigration were derived—a fact to be remembered when the prophets of evil bewail the influence of foreign born recruits. Next after Germany came Sweden and Norway, of whom the first furnished 64,607, the second (poor, struggling country, whose people are being only too rapidly driven away by frost and flood), 29 161, 93,708 in all, or 11 88 per cent. of the year's total. Next came the Celestial Kingdom, which appears—for the less time until the Pacific coast recovers from its scare—with 39,579 immigrants; then Italy, with 32,159—more than twice as many as the year before.

The probability is that immigration has, for the time at least, reached its highest point. For the last three months there has been a decided falling off from the arrivals of the corresponding months last year, so that the total for the calendar year 1882 is but 733,000, which is only 10,000 more than for 1881. The only satisfaction in which the rate of immigration is sustained are the Russians, Hungarians, and Norwegians, and these form as yet but a relatively small portion of the usual arrivals.

The immigrants usually come to this country with well-defined plans as to their place of destination, and for the most part provided with railway tickets for their journey inland. In such cases they are immediately taken in charge by the special agents of the various lines, who sort them out, place the women and children in separate cars, with their natural protectors, when they have any, and keep the rougher persons by themselves. At the start the cars are rude but cleanly. Plenty of fresh water is provided. Some effort is made, too, to keep the air fresh and the car decent, but this is very difficult. Most of the passengers are little accustomed to ventilation or to cleanly habits. Pipes are lighted, meals are spread in which sausage, cheese, garlic, and sauerkraut form prominent elements, and their mingled odors combine with the smoke of cheap tobacco to render the cars insupportable. Then there are children, and sometimes sick ones; above me men and women who regard dirt as a part of the natural protection against cold, there are still other sources of malodorous emanations which would make a resident of ancient Cologne hold his experienced nose. But if the immigrants on a class are far from neat, they are equally removed from the sensitiveness of those who have had gentler lives, they are accustomed to what seem intolerable hardships, and the success with which they endure the smells, the confinement, and the poisoned air of the emigrant trains bespeaks them the heroes of the struggle for the "survival of the fittest," that is to say, of the fittest to survive.

When the train stops, laden with its miscellaneous freight, the adults are glad to alight, the children rush eagerly about gathering the oddest memories of their journey. Bits of wood and iron, stones, oyster shells, and stray twigs of leaves, particularly if it be autumn, are proudly distributed about the cars. Occasionally a kitten is captured, to the delight of the whole car load. Until it manages to escape it is petted, fed, put to sleep in the dinner pails, locked in the arms of its friends, and rarely abused. Our artist represents some of these scenes

Chicago is the first main point of distribution. Before the arrival of the immigrants at this place the work of sanitary inspection is commenced, principally with reference to small-pox. The inspection is very thorough, and is conducted under the direction of the National Board of Health. The inspectors board the trains about one hundred miles east of Chicago. They first direct inquiries as to the general condition of the immigrants, then as to the fact of vaccination, and if it has been effected, the date of the last operation. Thus should have been attended to on shipboard, and on passenger of this class should be landed who has not been effectually vaccinated within a proper time, or failing that, vaccinated upon the ship. In some vessels the work is very carefully done; in others it is almost entirely neglected; in all it depends upon the fidelity and skill of the surgeon of the steamer, and there is no adequate system with reference to its enforcement. The vessels of the several great steam-ship lines differ widely Each immigrant passenger, male or female, young or old, should be provided with a card on board the steamer, giving the facts as to vaccination, but this requirement is only partially complied with. Thus, in his report dated October 10, 1882, Dr Raven, Supervising Inspector of the National Board of Health, stated that during the previous month one-fifth of the immigrants arriving in his district (Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri) were found "imperfectly or not at all protected against small-pox, liable to contract the disease and to propagate the contagion." This condition of things, however, is in a fair way of amelioration. The efforts of the National Board of Health have been earnestly seconded by the railway companies in every direction, and a good deal of interest is taken in the work abroad so that the proportion of immigrants vaccinated before leaving the foreign ports is steadily increasing. The general sanitary care of the immigrants is also improving, most of the improvement being due to the influence of the National Board.

THE THREE GRANDMOTHERS.

"Aun you would marry this fellow," said Grandma Von Breeks von Starch, in her bassoonliest (that is the only word I can think of with which to describe them) tones, "if you could?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Gertrude, meekly but firmly.

"The idea is simply preposterous!" declared Grandmother Huffey's fife-like voice.

"Preposterous indeed!" responded the bassoon. "More than preposterous—disgraceful! A mechanic! a common working man! a house-painter!"

"He's a fresco-painter," timidly corrected Gertrude.

"Which amounts to the same thing," groaned the bassoon.

"Michael Angelo—" began Gertrude

"Heaven preserve us!" shrilled the fife; "she's bringing some Irishman into the discussion now! Be silent, miss. We'll not hear another word from you. And understand distinctly, once and for all, that if that person calls here to-morrow, which no doubt he will have the impertinence and assurance to do, you are to dismiss him instantly, or we will"

"And endeavor to begin the new year"—the bassoon took up the strain again—"in a manner befitting a descendant of the illustrious General Von Breeks von Starch, whose unexampled bravery made him and Bergen-op-Zoom—the city of his birth—famous not only throughout Holland but the entire world, at a time when you were not dreamed of"

As for Great-gran Peeky, she had sat softly rocking to and fro in her cushioned rocker, munching her caraway biscuits—a store of which she always carried in a little satchel suspended at her side—sleepily regarding the group of talkers, and saying not a word herself. But that was nothing strange for her. She scarcely ever spoke even in monosyllables, and never even in them when Madame Von Breeks von Starch and Mistress Huffey were laying down the law (a favorite occupation of theirs, by the-bye) to servants, trades-people, or granddaughter Gertrude. And the last thing that could have occurred to either of the amiable law-makers would have been the idea of appealing to the old lady for an opinion on any subject whatever. It sufficed them that she paid without grumbling the greater part of the expenses of the household out of the income which was to cease at her death, and yet allowed them to manage all things pertaining to M in their own way

Gertrude—so named by Madame Von Breeks von Starch in honor of the patron saint of Bergen-op-Zoom—had lost both her parents in her infancy, and her father having been reduced to poverty some time before he died by various gentlemanly vices, she had been left wholly dependent upon her three grandmothers

Of these Great gran Peeky was the mother of Grandmother Muffey, who in turn was the mother of Gertrude's mother, while Grandma Von Breeks von Starch held the same close relationship to her father.

The bassoon grandmother was at the head of the American branch of her family (she had been a Von Breeks von Starch herself, and had married a cousin of the same name)—a family of great prowess and many bags of gold in their father-land some century and a half ago. She was tall, stout, and solid, with a round face, big black eyes, abundant iron-gray hair, and a carriage that immediately suggested to the beholder the last syllable of her aristocratic name.

The fife grandmother, five years her junior, was directly her opposite, being, short, slim, and limber, with a sharp-cut face, extremely thin fair hair, and faded blue eyes

Great-gran Peeky, notwithstanding her eighty-three years, was by far the best-looking of the three (though nine did look, I must confess, when munching her caraway biscuits, somewhat like a very nice meditative old rabbit). Her snowy white tresses waved prettily above her still dark eyebrows, beneath which beamed with a mild, dreamy light her soft brown eyes, and a pleasant winter bloom lingered on her wrinkled face.

It was from her Gertrude had received all the picture-books and sugar plums, almost always seasoned in perfect silence, that had brightened and sweetened her childhood, Grandma Von Breeks von Starch supplying the lessons in deportment, and Grandmother Huffey (let me whisper it) the punishments, usually inflicted with a slipper or the back of a hair-brush. Not in spite of the lectures and lessons and other disagreeable things, Gertrude led a tolerably happy life with her three grandmothers until her eighteenth birthday From that day dated such strict surveillance, so much coercion, so many scoldings, that even the hair-brush-and-slipper period seemed by comparison a regrettable one. And all on account of the young man who came to fresco the parlor ceilings A handsome young man he was, possessing the highly euphonious name of Everdell Trembett. But neither his good looks nor his romantic name availed him aught with the two managing grandmothers, who saw in him only one of the working-day race, with which the Huffeys and the Von Breeks von Starches had nothing in common

And therefore with no more thought about the matter than if John the men-servant had been there to his stool, they allowed their granddaughter to practice her music lessons to the back parlor—the sliding-door being partly open—while he was at work in the front.

And so it happened that Gertrude, trying to play an air from memory, and finding it continually eluded her, was about giving it up in vexation, when some one softly whistled it behind her; and turning quickly on the revolving stool, she saw the young painter, brush in hand, standing in the doorway

"Beg pardon, but ther is wher you wanted, is it not?" he asked in he cowed whistling, in a voice as deep as that of the bassoon grandmother, though much more melodious.

"Oh yes, thank you," said Gertrude, with a blush; and turning to the piano again, she played the whole air skillfully and gracefully.

"It's a beautiful thing," said the painter, still standing in the doorway; "but I thank the song beginning in this way"—and he prepared to whistle again, when he encountered the frozen frown of Madam Von Breeks von Starch, as she stepped into the room from the balcony, and died

And the next day the piano was closed and locked, and the fair performer a prisoner in her own room; and Grandmother Huffey, meeting Mr Everdell Trembett as he came to work, requested him in one brief sentence to "get through his work and go about his business as soon as possible"

But Love—bless his merry little heart!—laughs at locks and locksmiths, and the very next time Gertrude went for her singing lesson to the Conservatory (to and from the door of which she was always escorted by either Madame Von Breeks von Starch or Mistress Huffey) she found there a new pupil with a magnificent bass voice, and that new pupil was the fair-haired, blue-eyed young fresco-painter Not one word of this meeting, nor of the meetings that followed it ten or three times a week for six months thereafter, did the caughtr girl breathe to either of the three grandmothers, and the two younger of the trio exulted greatly over the strict vigilance with which they guarded the future bride (according to their long lived plans) of Diedrich von Breeks, the rich Holland merchant, due in New York with the new year But their exultation came to an end on New Year's Eve. On that evening the Conservatory of Music gave a pupil concert, and the very first duet was sung by Miss Gertrude Von Breeks and Mr Everdell Trembett. In vain had the latter begged to be left out of the programme, in vain had he summoned to his aid a mysterious throat-disease. His professor declared that sing he must, or lose his place in the Conservatory, and, what was still worse, prove himself an "ingrate to" And as the three grandmothers, sitting in great state near the stage, were horrified—that is, two of them were (great-gran munched her caraways as placidly as ever)—by seeing and hearing their granddaughter made operatic love to, in a very real love-making way, before a most fashionable audience, by the young man who frescoed their parlors.

In a moment the whole truth flashed upon their minds, and how they cut out the rest of the concert, no great was their indignation, they never know But at last, much to their relief, it came to an end, and the ominous silence with which they received the pretty culprit prepared her for the storm (the after-chaps of which I have recorded at the beginning of my story) that burst upon her head as soon as they reached home. When it was over Gertrude was allowed to seek her room. Here she threw off her cloak, turned the key in her door, and took from her bosom a note, which she hastily read.

"MY DEAREST" (thus it ran),—"I suppose—in fact, I know—you will have a scene to-night with her Royal Highness Von Breeks von Starch and her faithful henchwoman the Duchesse de Huffey. I am so sorry for you, dear! But don't let them frighten you; and don't be frightened at what I am about to propose. To-morrow will be New-Year's Day. Consent, I entreat you, to begin the new year with me. I have but a humble home to offer you, but in M waits the blessedest of mothers and the best of grandmothers (who will make your fourth) to welcome you. I shall be waiting, when you read this note, with a carriage around the nearest corner. Our alto and tenor will be with me, ready to act as bridesmaid and groomsman. Your grandmothers would never consent to our marriage, and unless you take a decisive step they will marry you, in spite of yourself, to your Dutch fifth cousin. Come, my darling, come. EVERDELL

"P S.—If you find it impossible to make your escape, why, then I must board the lions in their den to-morrow, and fight a duel with the Von Breeks von Starch as soon as he arrives in the country."

Gertrude stood an instant in thought. Then she glanced in the mirror It reflected a bride-like figure. Dress of some clinging creamy white material, dance-decked head, a cloud of lace clasped at the throat by a tiny gold cross. She smiled softly, re-read her note, waited impatiently until half an hour had passed, and then unlocked her door, opened it, and listened All was silent as the grave. Cautiously she ventured out into the entry, groped her way to the stairway, and began to descend the stairs, pausing on every other step to make sure that no one was astir and watching her. At last she reached the street door in safety It seemed an age to her until she had succeeded in unfastening the heavy chain across it—in reality it was just three minutes—and then she felt for the key. It was gone! Her heart sank within her.

"Poor Everdell!" she said, and sadly prepared to retrace her steps—not daring to try the basement way, because the servants slept in that part of the house—when a faint light appeared above her head, and looking up, she saw great-gran, carrying a lighted candle in her hand, coming down the stairs as carefully as she had come down them herself. "She will call the others as soon as she is sure it is I," she exclaimed, clasping her hands in an agony of fear. But great-gran came straight on, without a word, until she stood beside the frightened girl.

"Here's the key, my dear," she said, in a whisper, and with quite a girlish air "I've got a her that fits the General's door, though she don't know it, and I took this from under her pillow. Oh! if she'd caught me. But she sleeps like a soldier of the Revolution And here's a little gift for you"—putting a small package in Gertrude's hand "Law, child, how much you do look like me the night I ran away with Oliver Peeks! Your sweetheart's a good boy; I know all about him. Good-night, and a happy New-Year to you both!" And exerting all her strength —Gertrude standing motionless in her great surprise—the old lady unlocked the door, and gently pushed the girl out into the arms of her lover.

And when the fight was discovered next morning, the anger thereat was nearly equalled by the wonder to regard to the manner of it.

"She never went by the front door, for the key was under my pillow," thundered the bassoon.

"She couldn't have opened one of the parlor windows to have saved her life," squeaked the fife. "Only John and myself knew the secret of the fastenings. And if she could have opened it, she certainly could not have fastened it behind her. Some of the servants must have helped her"

But the servants emphatically declared their entire innocence.

"There's no use asking me," said Mistress Huffey, looking rather spitefully at the old lady as she rocked in her favorite rocker and munched her favorite refreshment. "She never sees nor hears anything But however the ungrateful minx got out, I'm glad she's gone, and not a penny of toy money does she ever see."

The great-gran's "little gift" proved to be a bonbon box filled with fresh caraway biscuits, in the midst of which lay a crisp thousand-dollar United States Treasury note. But never did Everdell or his wife hear from or see her again, for very soon after their marriage she passed quietly out of life, and so will remain an enigma to them forever

And Madame Von Breeks von Starch and Mistress Huffey having succeeded in marrying the merchant from Bergen op-Zoom to a distant relative of the Von Starch family—sought out and decreed for that purpose—departed with the bridal pair for that once renowned military town, and "the land of the free and the home of the brave" knew them no more.

MARGARET EYTINGE.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Card-playing as Railways.—Anthony Trollope.—Henry Fawcett.—No Cross on the Book.—The Primacy.—Bishop Wilberforce's Memoirs.

A new crime has long been the great desideratum among our sensation novelists, yet it has been reserved for the ingenuity of the judicial bench to discover it. Imagination, of course, had nothing to do with it; the legal mind never takes even a swallow flight in that direction, but after poring into certain dusky volumes it has come to the conclusion that what has been heretofore held to be an innocent relaxation—namely, a friendly cobber in a railway carriage—is a misdemeanor. As at least one-half of the business men who come to town from Brighton by the early express are in the habit of passing the time in thin way on their journey, we may look for some wholesale apprehensions. It will be very pretty reading some fine morning to learn that Mr. Bullion, the banker, Messrs. Centonge Rentbere the stockbolders, and Mr Square the city architect have all been lodged in Bow Street for this offense. When the administrators of the law do make fools of themselves they certainly do it thoroughly. I suppose it is because these bigwigs are so highly placed—so much "up in a balloon," as Mr Gladstone said of the House of Lords—that they occasionally exhibit such stupendous ignorance of what is passing below them. Otherwise it seems impossible they can be unaware that to many persons reading in a railway train is impossible, and that when a party of male friends are together, going up to Scotland to shoot, for example, nothing is more common than that they should beguile the tedium of the railway journey by whist. I can state of my own knowledge that two of her Majesty's present ministers are accustomed to do that. Perhaps these judges are Tories, and their object in this astounding interpretation of the law is to send half the cabinet to prison. It is interesting to conjecture which of the new law courts will be the scene of this impressive ceremony.

Long ago one of the quarterlies commenced an article, intended doubtless to be final in its criticism: "Shakespeare, Scott, Dickens—a descending scale, we allow," and went on to apologize for placing the author of Martin Chuzzlewit in such good company. Since then there has been another trinity of literary men—Dickens, Thackeray, and Trollope—whom it is still more natural to name in the same breath, and the last, alas! has just taken leave of us. Here, too, we will say "a descending scale, we allow"; and by the great majority of readers that opinion will be indorsed. Still Trollope, if not the equal of the other two, has much in common with them. It is far from my purpose to imitate the herd of obituary writers who, when a great man is dead, think they pay him the most honor by depreciating his living rivals—an easy task, which commends itself at once to indolence and envy. Yet in some respects, it must be confessed, Trollope as a novelist is the last of the giants. There are others left behind him who can write more thrilling stories, and one or two who have a greater command of humor, but there is no such creator of character. When I think of Trollope there rise before me, as if summoned by an enchanter's wand, a score of personages as real as any known to me in flesh and blood. I see the worldly Archdeacon, the masterful Mrs Proudie, dear, worthy Dr. Thorne, and the proud Duke of Omnium. I see sweet Mary Thorne and honest Miss Dunstable and pretty Lucy Robartes. When I think of all these people, and remember that one man begot them for the delight of us all, I feel a genuine gratitude to him, and acknowledge his genius. When I remember how many thousands of his fellow-creatures this man has pleased, beguiled them from sorrow and from pain, and made the hours that would have been leaden to them pass by in innocent mirth and fancy, I feel that we owe him more than a word of farewell. People in the country who see but little of society are especially indebted to him, for he supplied them with it. A new novel of Anthony Trollope's was as good as a dinner party, without the inconvenience of having to drive ten miles to it. The people he drew were often commonplace enough, but not more so than those they would have met, and just as real. He was not a painter of a high class; he could not have drawn Claverhouse or Tom Pinch; he was deficient in imagination; but those he saw he could photograph to the life. They were with few exceptions the folks we met yesterday, and the folks we shall meet to-morrow; but they were types, and stand for the whole of their respective classes. This is why I call him the last of the giants. There are more cunning workmen in his line of business than he was; his style was slipshod, his stories were thin; but his figures are stereoscopic; they stand out statuesque and solid. This is a real test of a good novelist. Tried by this standard, very few story-tellers, however excellent, come up to the mark. When one thinks of Lever, for example, one recalls only Mickey Free, and even he was but an Irish Sam Weller. A great fuss has been made about the death of the late archbishop, a pious, excellent man, regretted by all who knew him; but to the outside world the incident gives no sense of loss. The death of Anthony Trollope will be felt by tens of thousands who have never seen him, and in lands where he never set his foot. It is at the final moment that we discover how far inferior is the highest rank to genius.

If Mr Fawcett is not a genius, he has done great things in spite of obstacles from which genius might well have shrunk. There may be abler men in the present ministry, but none who have won for themselves a higher place in the opinion of the nation at large, for Henry Fawcett's includes his opponents. An honest, independent, unflinching man, without a touch of priggishness, or of that Jack-in-office insolence which is so infectious that even the healthiest nature is apt to catch it, he has earned the respect of all parties. That the physical disadvantage under which he labors helps to attract the public sympathy there is no doubt. The majority of mankind are content to succumb to circumstance. In this man they see one who has conquered it in its most adverse and antagonistic shape, and has set an example of heroism and philosophy to his fellow-creatures which will never be forgotten. It is not the mere politician, far less the mere partisan, who eagerly scans the bulletins that are issued from the blind man's sick-room; but in the railway carriage and in the tram one hears from all classes of the community, "I am glad to see Fawcett's better," or, "To have lost Mr Fawcett, sir, would have been a national loss."

A great deal of comment (and no wonder) has been made upon the conduct of a witness for the defence in the Lough Mask murders, who acknowledged that she had lied unhesitatingly, because "there was no cross on the book she was sworn upon." It no doubt exhibits a religious sentiment not distantly akin to African fetichism, but there are many people, after all, who hold pretty similar views, though they are not displayed in the same manner. Every man who takes advantage of the necessity of another to drive a hard bargain, and flatters himself that he is free from blame in so doing, is in the same position. "The law can not touch me," he says, or, in other words, "There is no cross on the book I kissed." It is the same with hundreds of persons, lawyers, financiers, politicians, critics, who, not being actually in Newgate, persuade themselves that they have done no moral wrong. As to the cross itself, that symbol is peculiar to the Catholic; but in this country the Protestant witness is often found kissing his thumb, instead of the Bible he is pressing with it, under the amazing belief that since he does not kiss the book itself, his falsehood is not perjury. It is a fact difficult to persuade what the advertisements call "a very large and important class," that it is not the gold, but the temple which sanctifieth the gold, that is of real importance.

I have been wondering during the last ten days whether I should like to be made Archbishop of Canterbury. The chance was so slight of my being appointed to the post that, as the mathematicians say, it might be "disregarded"; I could wonder quite freely, and without any personal prejudice or embarrassment. Of course I could have been made, everything is possible in an age which produces apricot jam from turnips, and should I have said, "Nolo episcopari"? In some points I should have improved the place—I mean the palace. An American bishop once bitterly complained to me that the hospitalities of his brethren of the bench in England never included a cigar. "There was no tobacco," he assured me, "even at Lambeth." Well, that I should certainly have remedied. But in other matters I might have fallen into error. If I saw two of my clergymen, in a parish full of destitute and heathen people, quarrelling over the cut of an ecclesiastical garment, I am afraid I should knock their heads together, which would probably be returning to a too early form of church discipline. If I found another bent upon being a martyr because he was not allowed to waste candle-light in the middle of the day, I should send my apparitor—whom I should choose for his thews and sinews—to shake him, which would probably produce paragraphs in the High-Church papers. Then, as no promotion would ever take place without a searching examination in the works of Scott and Dickens, the evangelical clergy who "object" to novels would be always complaining that they were debarred from "the higher sphere of usefulness"—which is Parsonic for good livings. The sympathy of the public would be with me, but I should suffer from clique and coteries. It would be impossible to be called "your Grace," and never to stir without a chaplain at one's heels, and at the same time to act naturally. To have £15,000 a year, but with the sacrifice of personal comfort! No. The offer, if it did come, would come too late. I had arrived at a period of life when comfort is everything. I decided that I would not take the Primacy. The matter is over now, but I honestly confess that I should have refused it on selfish grounds, and not "to oblige Benson."

It makes one very old to think that I was that gentleman's contemporary at college. Think of being contemporary of the Archbishop of Canterbury! When I knew him he belonged to "The Ghost Club," that under-graduate society I wrote you about for the investigation of physical phenomena. Observe the advantage of giving your mind in early life to spiritual things! If I remember right, he could tell a certain dream story of a very st[illegible] and con[illegible]ing kind. An archbishop, I suppose, may [illegible] tell stories, which, as my mi[illegible], by-the-bye, would be another and a most serious drawback to the acceptance of such a post.

I say "I suppose," for, to judge by some recent memoirs, the liberty of story-telling is not absolutely denied to bishops. "Oh, Sammy, Sammy, why did you ever keep a diary? And oh, son of Sammy, what sum in four figures could ever have induced you to publish it?" I perceive that in reply to some remarks upon his "amazing indiscretion" he has naively replied, "Oh, but if you had only seen what I forbore to publish, you would have been amazed at my moderation." My own conviction is that when a man finds himself a literary executor, his nature undergoes a transformation. The gravest man becomes a humorist, and the most respectable loses sight of the decencies. I am credibly informed that the editor of Carlyle's Reminiscences is still utterly at a loss to conjecture what harm he has done to his deceased friend's memory, and how it has come about that from having been one of the most respected of writers, Carlyle has sunk to zero in the barometer of public respect. I am convinced that every man ought to edit his own posthumous works.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

FINISHING AND REPAIRING.

THE Naval Appropriation Bill which recently passed the House contains a provision appropriating a large sum of money for the completion of the famous Monitors, upon which millions have already been spent, and which for a long time have been the support and comfort of contractors.

It is obvious that the design of completing the Monitors is not to furnish the nation with war vessels capable of resisting hostile men-of-war, since their armor is so light that it would offer no resistance worth mentioning to the guns in use in foreign navies; they are not designed for offensive purposes, for we have no guns with which to arm them that would pierce the armor of foreign iron-clads; they would be useless as cruisers, for they are unfit to go to sea; and they could not be used as [illegible]ving-ships, for they have room for a very small number of men, and they are so badly ventilated and lighted that they are dangerous to the health of the men who are compelled to live on board them. For what purpose they are to be completed is therefore far from clear.

As the Monitors are strongly built, they might be used to break up and crush the ice in the harbor, but unfortunately they are so slow that they can not be driven against the ice with force enough to accomplish anything except perhaps to entangle themselves hopelessly in the ice. The same want of power would make them useless as steam tugs, not to mention the fact that they steer so wildly as to endanger everything that is afloat in their vicinity. They would be useless as hospitals, or prison-ships, or floating Bethels, and as unfit for yachting as for warlike purposes.

There must be some reason why the completion of these extraordinary vessels is thought desirable by such disinterested friends of the navy as Mr Robeson and his associates, and it is a pity that the public is not told what this reason is. Can it be that they are to be used for decorative purposes by the painters employed by the navy? A great deal of paint could be lavished on their hulls and turrets, and the painters could thus obtain much valuable experience in the practice of their profession. Still, there are already so many vessels in the navy that are fit to be painted—and fit for nothing else—that we can hardly believe that the Monitors are to be finished solely in the interest of the painters. Possibly the government intends to establish a museum of specimens of obsolete types of naval architecture, but in that case why provide so many duplicate specimens of Monitors?

The only reasonable explanation is that the Monitors are to be completed in order that they may be repaired. Repairs upon the Monitors and their machinery have now been in progress for many years. If they have afforded so much opportunity for repairs before their completion, they can certainly be repaired a great deal more as they grow older. A really able Secretary of the Navy ought to be able to support in affluence at least two contractors for every Monitor by giving them a constant succession of contracts for repairing either the hulls, the turrets, or the machinery of these vessels. When we think how much these repairs would cost, and how much money would thereby be placed in circulation, we can begin to see that there is a reason for completing the Monitors. In fact, were work upon them to be now abandoned, we should thereby strike a serious blow at a very important American industry. At the same time only a Protectionist will consent to complete the Monitors solely in order that mechanics may grow rich by repairing them; and only an unusually violent Protectionist would think of converting the Naval Department into a sort of Department of Protection charged with protecting American industry in ways having only a nominal connection with naval affairs.

CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE.

STOCK exchanges are much the same the world over, and the scene of bustling excitement depicted by our artist on page 84 in the exchange of an American city which fifty years ago was not in existence, does not differ materially from what may be witnessed any day in Paris, London, or New York in the places where brokers congregate for business. The Chicago Exchange is a large and handsome building, and the amount of business transacted there is enormous.

SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

THREE of the six United States Senators whose portraits are given in this number are re-elected, and three are new to the position. Among the latter is Mr JOHN E. KENNA, of West Virginia, a young man of less than thirty-five years of age, who has already served his State as Representative throughout three Congressional terms. He was born at Valcoulon, Virginia, lived as a farmer boy and, when the war broke out, joined the Confederate army. In 1864 he was wounded in the service, and the following year was surrendered at Shreveport, Louisiana. Subsequently he attended St. Vincent's College, at Wheeling, was admitted to the bar in 1870, and has practiced since that time. He has been Prosecuting Attorney for Kanawha County, and has held the Circuit Courts of Lincoln and Wayne.

The Colorado Senators, Messrs BOWEN and TABOR, the former for the long term and the latter for the short, are both immensely wealthy. Judge BOWEN is about fifty years of age. At the outbreak of the war he was living in Kansas, where he organized a regiment, and served in the Southwestern campaigns. He was brevetted for meritorious conduct, and was given a special command in Arkansas. At the close of the war he became a delegate to the Constitutional Convention for the reconstruction of the State, and was made chairman of that body. After the re-admission of Arkansas into the Union Mr BOWEN was elected an Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the State. At that time he was recognized as one of the prominent Republican leaders in Arkansas. In 1871 he removed to New York, and in 1872 President GRANT appointed him Governor of Idaho. Afterward he removed to Colorado, and was elected a judge of one of the courts in that State. He became interested in mining property, and is now reckoned as one of the "Bonanza kings." Mr TABOR, whose fortune is estimated at from eight to ten million dollars, was a poor man five years ago. He kept a small store in California Gulch, near Leadville, for the sale of miners' supplies. At that time SIMON HOOK and a shoemaker named AUGUST RISCHE, both without means, induced him to enter into a partnership with them, and put in what miners call a "grub stake." In other words, Mr TA[illegible] was to furnish tools and [illegible] to them while they were engaged in searching for minerals, and in return he was to have a share of what they found. HOOK and RISCHE went upon a hill near Stray Horse Gulch, now known as Fryer Hill, where GEORGE H. FRYER was searching for ore. Soon after Mr FRYER found the vein Mr TABOR's partners pierced it. Mr TABOR afterward bought out his partners, and in [illegible] six months he took out of the mine and sold three or four hundred thousand dollars' worth of ore. He then sold the mine to Messrs. CHAFFEE & MOFFATT for a large sum of money. These two mines and two smaller ones were afterward consolidated under one management. Although the mine was the basis of Mr TABOR's present wealth, he has often said that if he had known where his partners were going to begin work, he never would have risked anything on their success, and more than once before the ore was struck he talked of withdrawing his "grub stake." In 1879 and 1880 he was Lieutenant-Governor of his State.

The Senator from Rhode Island, Mr ANTHONY, is in his sixty-eighth year. He is a graduate of Brown University, was editor of the Providence Journal, twice Governor of Rhode Island, has been in the United States Senate for the last twenty-four years, and has twice been elected President of that body.

Senator PLUMB, of Kansas, originally hailed from Ohio, where he was born in 1837. He learned the printing business, and before he was out of his teens removed to his present State. He was a member of the Leavenworth Constitutional Convention in 1859, and was afterward admitted to the bar. He served in the Legislature, and was Speaker of the House. This will be his second term in the Senate.

New Jersey's Senator, Mr McPHERSON, is a well-to-do farmer and dealer in live stock. He was born in New York State in 1833, and removed to Jersey City in 1859. He was an Alderman from 1864 to 1870, and for three years was President of the Board. In 1868-9 he was President of the People's Gas-light Company, and in 1873 was chosen President of the Central Stock Yard and Transit Company. He was a State Senator in 1871-3, a Presidential Elector on the TILDEN ticket in 1876, and succeeded Mr FRELINGHUYSEN in the United States Senate in 1877.

"UNSER FRITZ."

On our first page we present a portrait of the Prince whose succession to the honors and responsibilities of the imperial throne of Germany can not be far distant. The reigning Emperor, full of years and in declining health, must before long be "gathered to his fathers," leaving the government in the hands of one who not only as a soldier but as a friend of the people has won the admiration and affection of his countrymen.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince Imperial of the German Empire, was born on the 18th of October, 1831. He received a liberal education, and at an early age entered the military service, in which he was rigorously trained. On the 25th of January, 1858, he was married to VICTORIA, Princess Royal of England, the eldest child of Queen VICTORIA and Prince ALBERT—a union which, besides being a true-love match, was very acceptable to the people of both countries. The twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding was to have been celebrated with great magnificence, but sympathy with the sufferers by the disastrous floods led them to decline the public festivities, and to request, in addition to their own large charities, that those who were intending to send them silver-wedding gifts should distribute the money among the poor of the devastated districts.

It is unnecessary to recapitulate the incidents of the Prince's military career. In two great wars he has exhibited great capacity as a soldier, and will succeed to the throne with all the glamour which distinction on the field of battle can bestow upon his name. But he is not a soldier merely. He has broad and liberal views of state affairs, is a friend of popular education, and in him Prussia will have the most enlightened and progressive monarch that kingdom has ever known.

ICE-YACHTING ON THE HUDSON.

ICE-BOATING is not a purely American sport. For many generations it has been known and practiced in the fiords of the Scandinavian peninsula. But in this country, and especially upon the Hudson River, which offers almost unequalled facilities for it, the sport has attained its greatest development, and ice-yachts built that the most inured Norwegian would view with apprehension and alarm. There has been more or less ice-boating done on the Hudson for twenty years, but the establishment of clubs and the bringing of the sport from a pastime feræ naturæ, as it were, under definite rules and regulations, are not much more than half that age.

Like all great things—like the toboggan, like Magna Charta and COLUMBUS's egg and NEWTON's apple—the ice-yacht is simple. "The earth is very simple," said GOETHE; "otherwise it could not have lasted so long." The ice-boat is very simple, or it could not go so fast. It consists, when reduced to its simplest expression, of two planks and three skates, two sails and a rudder, and it is little more in its ultimate [illegible] One plank, technically the stri[illegible] crossing the boat, has a skate, [illegible] The other, running fore [illegible] and firmly lashed to the [illegible] of the [illegible] and its after [illegible] with [illegible] stained with [illegible] At this [illegible]

The stays of the [illegible] open land to the ends of the stringer. The rig is jib and mainsail, though [illegible] adventurous vessels of the ice add a superfluous and defiant [illegible] topsail. All of this gear needs to [illegible] of the very strongest. At a race last week [illegible] landing boat, [illegible] the warning post at the rate, as an enthusiastic spectator [illegible] red, of seventy miles an hour, one of the bowsprit stays [illegible] way, and the [illegible] bow [illegible] itself, with a report like that of a [illegible] cannon, and in [illegible] the madly careering yacht looked as if she had been [illegible] a thing of life into a miscellany of [illegible] and junk.

Whether this proceeding assists the gravity of the runner or not, so as to keep it bearing, it certainly counteracts any tendency to undue lessity on the part of the ballast.

The crew and passengers do themselves up into the likeness of hedgehogs with coats and mufflers and many stockings. The breezes of January on the Upper Hudson in ice-yachting weather are apt to be a trifle keen when one is going against them or at right angles with them at the speed of a special express train. Moreover, the chilliness serves another purpose. When the helm is put down on the wind to tack, or the cheerful operation of jibing is undertaken going free, the change of direction is so sudden that the luxurious passenger finds himself suddenly left, and is apt to be extremely surprised at his own momentum. He goes skipping over the ice like what is called in the base-ball field a "fast grounder," and his only hope is that he may not be "sharply fielded" by an imbedded log in the ice or a casual bowlder. So [illegible] so he has only the ordinary assertion of the frozen surface to contend with he goes on without damage until friction and gravity re-assert their sway, provided he [illegible] thickly enough clad to insure him against casual contusions. Tremendous as is the speed the ice-boats attain, and great as seem to be the risks of the sport, serious accidents are very rare, and fatal accidents almost unknown.

The speed of ice-boats is a mooted question. The sensations of the ice-boat men, which are commonly appealed to in oral discussions, are about as trustworthy as would be the impressions of a man who had been shot out of a gun touching the rate at which he was travelling, and the radius of the curve he was describing. The ice-yachts, however, have no difficulty, with the right breeze and good ice, in beating the fastest express-trains, and one boat has an undisputed record of nine miles in [illegible] minutes, or at the rate of seventy-five miles an hour. No wonder that the votaries of such a sport find all other winter sports "slow" after it, nor that the excitement of peril adds to the exhilaration it induces!

Here, to ice-yachting as to yachting in the final [illegible] is the question of power. The dimensions of the "vessels" are steadily increasing, and the latest addition to the winter fleet, the Arrow, has runners of about [illegible] the [illegible] length, measures 60 [illegible] from bowsprit end to rubber post, [illegible] feet from bowsprit end to end of main-boom, and spreads over 1600 feet of canvas.

APPROACHING THE TRUTH.

CHAPTER XI.

THE TRUTH OF IT.

Lucy Brake dropped like a stone to the floor. Had Kitty shot her, the effect could not have been more complete. Prepared as she was for the avowal, the answer was nevertheless as hard for Lucy to resist as to accept.

She had brooded for so many years on the love and constancy of her young husband, of the hero that he was in her generous estimation of him, and never dreaming for an instant of the hero he was not.

When she came to herself she found her head resting on Kitty's breast, with Kitty's arms round her, and her tears upon her cheek.

"My poor Lucy! I did not think you would grieve way like this," said Kitty.

Lucy struggled from his embrace, rose to her feet, and sat in a chair away from her; and Kitty stood with folded hands, sadly submissive to this new evidence of aversion. It was to be expected, perhaps; there had been too lavish a profession of friendship for a beginning, and here had been a terrible confession, or appeared like one at first sight. Kitty moved slowly to the window and closed it, went to the door and locked it, and then resumed her position before the young widow, like one prepared to answer any questions which Lucy had the heart to put to her.

It was a terrible ordeal to regard her with a grave and severe look—a woman wondering at her and forever perplexed.

"I am sorry you have heard this," said Kitty at last, "that such a miserable truth should have come to you to-night."

"She told me, not you," replied Lucy, in a low tone; "you would have deceived me to the end of your life, had it been in your power."

"I think I would," answered Kitty. "I think it would have been for the best. Morris Brake is dead; what necessity was there to speak of his faults, or to shake your trust in his virtues? It is all over and gone."

"Yes, it is all gone," repeated Lucy, "gone like a dream."

"Why did Miss Brake tell you anything of that?"

"To crush me down, to make my dark world darker and more desolate," said Lucy; "that is all."

"No, hardly that," answered Kitty. "She was thinking you had made an idol to your heart of Morris, and he was not worthy of your devotion, that he stood between you and all chance of happiness."

"Why do you think so?"

"She has spoken of it very frequently," replied Kitty. "'If Lucy would think less of my dead brother,' she has said, 'she would love a better man some day.' She—"

"I don't want to hear what Miss Brake has said," cried Lucy, petulantly, "but what you have to tell me. You own he made love to you. In what way do you mean?"

"Is it worth while?" asked Kitty, helplessly; "is it any use?"

"Yes. Let me hear the whole truth; let me know my Morris in he was, rather than as my fancy made him. He is dead," she added, mournfully; "he was everything to me. I shall not love him the less."

"Then why—"

"He made love to you— Well, go on," cried Lucy, impatiently.

"Pretended to love me, would be a better term," said Kitty, "for he did not care for me in any way, and I disliked him from the first."

"I can't believe it," said Lucy at once. To dislike Morris Brake was a complete impossibility, thought this young one-ideaed woman.

"When he came to see his sister he would pay me a great deal of attention. It was dull at Boston, he did not always agree with Miss Brake, and I was a little distraction to his dullness, probably nothing more at any time. I am not quite certain," continued Kitty, "that Miss Brake would have been sorry if I had learned to love her brother, she thinking he was single, and a wild young fellow with an constancy of purpose in him. Of his flouts she had been afraid; he had as many faults as good traits of character, she used to say of him, and his impulses might lead him on at any time to ruin. I thought then he might have been in love with me a little. I did not fancy it was all play-acting until I heard he was your husband."

"And you heard that?"

"After his death."

"Not before then—at Boston? Go on, please."

"There is no more to say. There is very little which you can care to hear. I knew I was not fit for him. I was always glad of a pretext to avoid him and his compliments. His one surprise, poor fellow, was that I was not flattered by his notice, or to be led away by it."

"To be led away," repeated Lucy, in a husky whisper.

"Yes; he would have led me away if he could," said Kitty; "he liked me a little, and I was only his sister's servant in his eyes; one ruined woman more or less, would not have mattered to him any more than it matters to many a scoundrel like him. Ah! forgive me," cried Kitty, quickly; "I forgot for a moment he was your husband."

"You have a right to think the worst of him," murmured Lucy, "if this is true—if it is possible to be true."

"If it will spare you any pang, pray think the worst of me," said Kitty, "and that all this is my poor invention. What can it matter?—what does it matter?"

"Yes—he is sleeping in his grave. He can not answer any charge against him; he has had no time even to say 'God forgive me?'" murmured Lucy. "Yes, what does it matter now?"

She sat and stared before her like one who had been struck a heavy blow and was bewildered by it; the pained, perplexed look on the fair young face touched Kitty's heart, and set her own troubles further back that night.

"You will never care to speak to me any more," said Kitty, mournfully, "and all this has been as much against my will that you should know. So I lose two friends in one night, and am more alone than ever."

"You have quarrelled with Greg?" asked Lucy, in a faint, far-away voice.

"Not quarrelled with him. I have hurt him."

"You have been too hasty. You am playing into the hands of that dreadful woman Hester Brake, as I have done to-night. Why does she exult in human misery as much?" moaned Lucy.

"She acts for the best—for what she thinks is right," said Kitty; "and if the truth hills, is as still the truth with her."

"You feel she has injured you too?"

"I—I would rather not bear a word against her," answered Kitty.

"Strange the power to do mischief which she has," said Lucy, shuddering again. "She rests amongst us like a blight. How long will she live, I wonder," she added, bitterly, "to do such cruel work?"

"Hush! hush!" cried Kitty. "She has only stripped the bandage from our eyes as roughly that the truth has blinded us. That is all. We shall see more clearly presently," she added, with a sigh.

"You may," answered Lucy; "I shall not."

"Yes, yes, Lucy, you will; and if I may call you Lucy now," said Kitty, stealing toward her, bending over her, and putting her arms timidly around her neck; "and you will grow more content, more happy, with every day that follows this. This is on new trouble to you—only an old one which you have chanced to hear of, and from which I would have spared you all my life."

"You would have deceived me, then?"

"Yes, I would."

"And would have been glad to be deceived?"

"About Greg?—yes," answered Kitty, "I think I would; but God knows! I have been trying to piece it out, and have only failed. I had been to sure—so very sure—that his life belonged to me, and was to be trusted to me. But—you don't care to hear. I'm selfish to speak of is to-night."

"And I—I can not think of it," said Lucy, rising. "I should be glad to get to my own room. I feel very weak."

"Lean upon my arm, and let me lead you."

"—I am afraid of you," said Lucy, faintly. "I don't know what other secrets you may have—what else you may tell me some day. Yours has been to dark a life!"

"Yes, madam," said Kitty, very humbly, "that is true."

"All is confusion with me, and nothing seems as it was this bright morning."

"Nothing is," came the slow answer back.

"I am like a bell wisted girl who has lost her way; but," she said, "I may come back to it, with some one to love and to trust in—and with God's help. To-night I am dreadfully alone, trusting no one in the world."

"You have a father to love, you have John Woodhatch to love you, Greg to love you, little Morice to love you," said Kitty. "Ah! Mrs. Brake, you are rich in affection, and have lost no friend. It is I who am alone."

Lucy put her hand through Kitty's arm.

"But it is you who are strong—who will know what to do. Why is it," she asked, "that I am weaker than you—so much more of a child?"

"That may be all the better, presently," said Kitty.

"I do not see that."

The two young women went out into the corridor, Lucy walking with difficulty, like a woman in her sleep, and Kitty guiding carefully her steps. Lucy's room was only a few paces off, but it was very dark without, and some one seemed to rustle away in the distance, and he lost in it.

"Mrs. Chadderton, I suppose," said Lucy, after pausing for a moment; "she has been playing the spy as usual. Ah, well, what does it matter?—as you said a little while ago."

"Not much," responded Kitty.

At Lucy's door they paused.

"If I have stabbed you with my words to-night," said Kitty, "try and forget them presently. I would have spared you had you let me."

Lucy put her hands upon her shoulder, and kissed her softly.

"I thought I hated you an hour ago, but I don't," she said. "Good night."

Kitty returned her kiss and good-night, and walked back thoughtfully to her own room.

CHAPTER XII.

A LETTER FROM ABROAD.

Peace remained in the ascendant at Farm Forborn for several days after this, and each inmate, in trouble and doubt, kept the trouble and doubt in the background, and did not harass other folk with them. Still it was a false peace, which deceived on one; and there were many waiting—almost patiently!—for the storm which they thought must come soon to the homestead of John Woodhatch.

John Woodhatch, perhaps, was the least suspicious of all the little community gathered at Skegs Shore, although he had been roughly awakened to the fact that one great scheme of his life was, as far as it had gone, an utter failure after all. One more mistake of his, despite his generous planning for other people's welfare, and his planning for the common good. The collapse of one more scheme, the greatest and the best, and it had all ended as Parson Larcom had prophesied.

"Not that it is the end of it, Alec," he said; "or I will own it is the end. You are only right up to present date, and life is full of change."

"And women too," added Mr Larcom, "they never are of one mind very long, we know."

"I don't know," answered Woodhatch; "the few I have known I used to think were absolutely fixed to one idea."

"Miss Brake excepted," said Mr Larcom, with a laugh.

"Oh, she's mad!" was the short reply, as John Woodhatch tramped away over his fields. He hardly meant what he said, although Miss Brake aggravated him at times by her innumerable suspicions, by his calm demeanor, as well as by her fits of fretfulness. He was discontented with the whole set at present; there was an alleging to one idea one about them, he should be a woman-hater in good time, he thought; the fickleness of women vexed him, their sudden change of opinion and intention kept him restless, and the mystery enclosing their motives, when he asked for motives, would have made him as insane or they were if he had not sought refuge from everything and everybody in sheer hard work, and bargains at the markets.

It was Kitty who had given the last turn to his thoughts. The girl from whom he had least suspected a disappointment or rebuff had suddenly confronted him with the announcement that she was not going to marry Greg Dorward. She had faced him a few days ago with this astounding statement, looking as earnestly and straightforwardly into his inquiring face that he had not the heart to be very angry until after she had left him. As he informed Mr Larcom afterward, he had stood like a fool, and had had scarcely a word to say in reply, although a five years' scheme had been shivered and splintered before him as though it had been glass.

He had been speaking of Tolland's farm to her; indeed, had paid her the compliment one morning of offering to drive her to is on a visit of inspection, and she had seized the opportunity of apprising him that the engagement was at an end between her and Greg Dorward.

"It is as well to tell you I shall never marry him, sir," was the statement made; "that I have persuaded him to agree to the breaking of our engagement, that seeing him again, and judging for myself that I am no more fit for him than he is for me, I feel sure it is the best to part whilst we are friends."

All this had been spoken very rapidly, like a girl in considerable haste to get to the end of a story which embarrassed her seriously to its relation.

"This is Greg's fault, not yours," came the quick answer back, and to the listener's first surprise.

"No, sir; it is mine."

"On your honor?"

"On my honor, Mr Woodhatch," was the reply. "Greg is sorry, I think. Greg would marry me to-morrow if I would change my mind again."

"What the devil have you been quarrelling about?" John Woodhatch had exclaimed; and this was the one little burst of anger he had indulged in during the interview. "Do you think I asked you here to wrangle with him?"

"I have not quarrelled with him; he has not been angry in any way with me. It is all my fault, if there is any fault in judging what is best for one's self," said Kitty.

"You are only a child. How do you know what is best?"

"I think—I hope I do," answered Kitty.

"And are you wishes to go for nothing?" he asked; "and at the last, like this, when I have found a farm for him, and stocked it, and made a home for you both?" And both of you dumb till it was all arranged, and I had spent toy money."

"Ah! there I am very sorry. But Greg and I have just met as man and woman, we had been so long strangers to each other. You had only talked of him to me for all these five long years, and I did not know him for myself. There was the mistake of it all, Mr. Woodhatch," continued Kitty; "and when it came to the reality, when I could but see in a marriage with Greg much on happiness and more mistaken, I made up my mind once to become his wife."

"Very well," said John Woodhatch, gloomily.

"You do not wish me to be unhappy, dear master, I am sure. You would not care to saddle Greg with a soured and discontented woman."

"Like how I was idiot enough to put you with, and whose manners you have copied," he said, bluntly.

"Oh, Mr Woodhatch!"

"There' do as you like, Kitty," he said, touching her shoulder with his broad hand by way of consolation or apology; "it is your life, not mine, and I don't want to make it unhappy."

"Thank you."

"Still I am sorry for Greg. He has not been treated well in the matter, as far as I can see; but," he added, quaintly, as he walked away, "hanged if I see an inch ahead at present."

He had gone away, thinking Greg might offer some clearer explanation of the facts, but Greg's frankness had only more completely mystified and disheartened him.

"I am more sorry than you are, sir," was Greg's explanation of the case. "I am sure she would have made me the best of wives. It is her self-depreciation which renders her morbid and nervous. She is unfit for me, she says, and nothing at present will convince her to the contrary."

"At present? Then you think it likely she will change her mind?"

"Yes, sir. We have not quarrelled."

"So she tells me."

"And I don't give up the hope that all will soon come around," Greg added.

"You am not one to give up," remarked John Woodhatch. "Every day you remind me more of what I was to your age—full of courage and trust, and not to be cowed in the face of opposition. I should be very sorry if you were not able to conquer this silly fit of fastidiousness in Kitty Vanch. It is as right a thing you two should marry."

"Yes, it is," Greg responded.

"I suppose that fidgety Miss Brake has been advising her," he muttered. "I wish she had never come here."

"She is full of fancies, poor woman," answered Greg, as meekly as his master.

Then they had separated, and matters, as we have already intimated, had gone on peacefully, to all outward appearance, until this date; that is, some two weeks since John Woodhatch had filled his house with guests, and, as it appeared now, to his own discomfiture. All would be right in time, he hoped; but the present was not very encouraging, although he could take comfort to it, and satisfaction from it, Lucy Brake being one of his guests, and one who it was a deep, silent pleasure to know was close at hand, and once more a part of his strange home. That her face was very full of sad thoughts, even of vague doubts, only increased his old interest to her—his wish to be of service to her for the remainder of his days. And if the wish were futile, as he knew it was, still she was by his side to farm Forborn, and did not speak yet of going away.

Meanwhile, Hester Brake remained very impassive, and to all outward seeming took no satisfaction to herself at the result of her last revelations. The thin, worn face remained in shadow still, and the eyes had the same far-away look which they had always had. Kitty was as attentive as ever, but the consciousness that the nurse's words had helped to separate her from Greg seemed to show itself to Kitty's manner, try how she would to appear the same. It was for the best, it had been done for her good, but forever after this she, Hester Brake, would be associated with unhappiness, with having worked much ill.

"Better to hate me than marry a man who never cared for you," she said one day, suddenly, to Kitty.

"I don't hate you, Miss Hester," was the reply.

"Do you love me any the less?"

"No, no. You were right enough in guessing Greg did not care for me, and it was right I should know. You gave me my chance," answered Kitty.

"No, I did not."

Kitty looked surprised.

"You would never have married him, even had you forgiven his loving Lucy Brake," said Hester.

"It was not to be."

"I forgave his love for her at once," answered Lucy, quickly. "I keep away from him—forever perhaps—because I can not be of help to him."

"So that is it," muttered Hester, "and you am as weak a fool as the rest of us."

Kitty did not know what Miss Brake meant by that half soliloquy, and did not press her for an explanation. She stole away the instant afterward, and Miss Brake, staring before her into the garden, was not aware that she had gone. Lucy replaced her in a few more minutes, but she did not look toward her, and the young widow passed through the room with no salutation to her sister-in-law. Lucy was less of a heroine than Kitty Vanch, perhaps; as all events possessed less of that heroic quality which consists in forgiving those who have dispelled our nonsense, and supplied over the ideals which those concepts had set up. In a fit of petulance of anger recrimination, as it seemed to Lucy, Hester had drawn the true portrait of Morris Brake, and Lucy had not been grateful for the portraiture, and had even told Hester that she lied. Hence the reference to Kitty Vanch, and all the stern, bare truths of these latter days—the clear, cold, cruel daylight wherein no fancies lived.

"You and my Lucy don't appear to be quite as big friends as we might to be, considering the relationship," said Alec Larcom to her one morning, when she was reading a letter which had just reached her from abroad.

"No. She does not like me," commented Miss Brake, without looking up, "and I am tired of trying to make her."

"Ye've had more words, I suppose?"

"Hasn't she told you?"

"No. She never did tell me more than she could possibly help," was the dry reply. "Ye see, I'm a kind of creature that don't encourage confeedence."

"No, you are too hard," said Hester, still perusing her foreign epistle. "If there had been more gentleness in your nature, and less presumption, you would have been a better father to her."

"Marcy as us, woman, what next will ye say?" exclaimed Mr Larcom.

"She never had a mother. And girls brought up without mothers have a harder battle than the rest, let fathers be what they may," she said, looking up from her letter for the first time.

"Ay, there's something in that," answered Mr. Larcom, "although ye have an uncomfortable way of explaining matters, Hester."

"And women will not comfort her a great deal, I presume—as it might you, Mr Larcom," she added.

"I have a wholesome respect for money," confessed the Methodist, "knowing the good it may do."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1383.

"To yourself?"

"To most folk, properly applied," he added.

"Will that console Lucy, do you think, for all the wretched past?"

Hester Brake held the letter she had been reading to Mr Larcom, he took it, and adjusted his glasses carefully on his nose.

"It's in French," he said with disgust, "and ye know I can't read such outlandish rubbish."

"It says that the estate is all settled, and the money which my had father made abroad, Heaven knows by what means, is at the sole disposal of his heirs; that is, at the disposal of myself and little Morice, presently, who represents my dead brother. I suppose. I don't know French law, and it is too late to learn."

"Ye can take some things very coolly, Hester Brake," observed Mr. Larcom, returning the letter. "To think ye should have been reading good news like that with as mercerable a face, and talking to me of my presumption all the while!"

"It is not good news to me. It comes too late, even if it were. I would rather have one true friend than all this money."

"How much money is it altogether?" asked Mr Larcom, with increasing interest in the subject.

"Some forty thousand pounds."

"Lord save us all!" ejaculated her listener.

CHAPTER XIII.

WAITING TILL TO-MORROW.

The news of the change of fortune for Hester Brake—for Lucy Brake and Morice—was not long in circulating through the farm, and there was much discussion on the subject, and a new topic of interest, which the orvalid lady alone appeared to shun.

"It is not good news to me, John," she said, for the second time, when the farmer had offered his congratulations in his blunt way an hour or two later, after Mr Larcom had been overwhelmed by the intelligence.

"Larcom tells me you think so," cold Woodhatch, "but you do not know."

"Shall I have time to know?" she asked.

"To be sure you will."

"Where is the will I gave you to mind?" she asked.

"In my safe, there."

"Take most of it, now there is much money to leave behind me," she edjured, satirically, "and so many people to think of."

"It is not likely to be lost."

"That's well. And should I live to become possessor of this money," the cold, "there is a long account to settle between us, John, and so speedily so may be."

"Oh, rubbish!"

"You were very kind to me and Morris," she continued, "you saved us from the evil examples and bad lives; you stood our friend when we were short of friends, and knew not whose to turn. For your care of us there can only the grateful thanks come of a disagreeable woman, but for the money we have cost you I can at least make some amends."

"When you get your money," laughed John Woodhatch, "we one have half a dozen hot words over the settlement."

"Ah! you think, with all the rest of them, what a bad-tempered, envious, querulous woman I have been. Don't you?" she asked.

"What a question!"

"Don't you?" she repeated. "Why can not you answer me in a straightforward manner?"

"Well, I have not to bad an opinion of you as all that, Hester, or I should have never chosen you to take care of Kitty Vanch."

"I was more amiable then."

"So you were," assented Mr Woodhatch.

"And I have altered very much."

"You have altered a little," he remarked, "but that—"

"And I have stood between you and your pet scheme of marrying Kitty to Greg Dorward."

"Well, probably you have," said John Woodhatch

"And I have told Lucy that my brother Morris was not the good, faithful, high-souled being she had pictured him," she added.

"What on earth did you tell her that for?" exclaimed the farmer. "Of all the inconsistent, aggravating women, I believe you are the worst."

"Yes, that's your opinion," said Hester; "very likely I am. It is hard to judge one's own character, self steps so formidably in the way. But I thought it was best, she should know that poor Morris was not a hero."

"Best for her, do you mean?"

"And for you," she added, calmly; "the dead husband was to your way, John. And you will never be happy without the becomes your wife."

"I have given up all hope of that."

"How long?"

"Years. I wish I had told you this before," he replied.

"Hope will come again to you."

"Lucy Brake and Morice and her father will go abroad and live abroad presently—very shortly, indeed," he said, "they have been talking of it to-night as a united thing. The mere thought of the money brings already changes with it."

"Change is the lot of all of us. There is no rest."

"No," answered John Woodhatch, thoughtfully.

"And you can live abroad too, John," she said, after a long silence.

"Impossible"

"You will have nothing to stop in England for except Farm Forlorn, and its record of miserable failures," she said.

"I will live for my failures, then," was the reply. "I have always said to myself, to God, that there was my one task."

His voice faltered for an instant, and she reached out her hand and touched his own very gently and even timidly.

"Good man, striving to do good, and failing perhaps more completely than you thank," she said. "still there is God's reward for all this presently. And so, God bless you, John!"

To his astonishment she raised his hand to her lips, and brought the blood to a rush to his face. He looked round hurriedly, and in no small confusion, but there was no one to observe them.

"Let me lean upon your arm to-night, the one friend whom I have not set against me yet," she said: "will you see me to my room done, and save Kitty coming down?"

"Yes—if you wish," he replied, almost reluctantly.

"They will only think you are becoming more attentive to me now that I have some money to leave behind me," she said, with her old satirical vein asserting itself more more; "but what they think of you—or me—does not matter in the least."

"Why, no," answered her old friend.

They went upstairs together, the leaning, as he fancied, more heavily upon his arm than he had known her do on the few occasions that he had offered her his escort.

In the corridor, and a few paces from her room, they met Kitty coming toward them. She was surprised to meet them, and Miss Brake put her, gently but not unkindly, aside, and walked on to the door of her room by the side of the farmer

There she paused, with Kitty for a witness, and with her hand still upon his arm.

"Good night," she said.

"Good night, Hester," he replied

"There is one thing more I should have liked to tell you to-night, John," she said, regarding him wistfully, "but I am afraid."

"Yes, yes, don't let us have anything new to-night," he said, with alacrity; "it is getting very late."

"To-morrow, or the next day, perhaps, if you will."

"Very well," he said, "and if it is important."

"It is terribly important to you."

"Oh, so we must see."

"And to most of us at Skegg Shore," she added. "Good-night again, and—to-morrow—then."

"Ah! yes—to-morrow," and then John Woodhatch hurried away, glad to escape his companion before any fresh crisis should escape her.

But the morrow found Hester Brake a woman very wild and strange, who knew not friend from foe, and cowered from all alike in the frenzy of the fever which had come to her, suddenly and swiftly, like the trouble which had followed her through her life, and had never let her rest—that had even met her on the threshold of her new prosperity, and stretch her down like this.

COLDS, AND HOW TO CHECK THEM.

What is the most common of all diseases in our climate? A cold.

Are colds curable? Strictly speaking, no. After it is fully developed, I have never known a cold to be cured by medical treatment: the disease runs through a certain course, and in the popular phrase "cures itself" after a greater or less degree of suffering on the part of the patient. It is, in the scientific phrase, one of the "self limited" diseases. But sometimes, when a damaged organ is attacked, a cold may terminate less favorably; sometimes in pneumonia or pleurisy, or even in consumption. More frequently a succession of neglected colds brings on chronic catarrh, a complaint that is particularly frequent in our trying climate.

But if we can not actually cure a cold after is is fully developed, it is all the more important that an should be able to do one of two things with is—first, to cut it short at the outset, before the disease has time to develop itself; or second, to prevent its running on into any of the bad consequences that I have named.

We will look at these cases separately. And first, what is the nature of this disease which I have called incurable, but which can still be checked in many cases at the outset, or even, if it should run its natural course, may be controlled to to its consequences?

A cold is an inflammation, attended by more or less fever; its usual cases is exposure to a draught, and especially exposure of the feet or of the throat. It attacks the lining membrane of the nostrils, the fauces and pharynx, or the trachea and bronchi, or more than one of these regions, and we ordinarily speak of these these forms as cold in the head, sore throat, and cold in the chest. A cold in the head begins with sneezing and "deflexion," or a discharge from the nostrils; a cold in the throat, with hoarseness and sore glands; a cold to the chest, with a cough Either form often runs into one or both of the other forms, but it is important to distinguish them at the outset, as I shall point out or speaking of the treatment.

I. To cut short a cold at the outset—When the cold begins "to the head," with sneezing, watery eyes, and deduction, the following treatment will cut it short four times out of five, but it must be taken at once, or at the latest within six hours after the first symptoms occur. I don't say it is a pleasant treatment, but it is an effective one. Fill a tumbler half full of tepid water (four ounces), add to it twenty drops of laudanum, close the left nostril with the forefinger of the left hand, incline the head to the right, and holding the glass in the right hand, press the edge of it against the right nostril, inclining the glass, then sniff up very slowly a quantity of the solution, until you feel it beginning to run down at the back part of the throat. Reverse the operation for the other nostril. Do not blow out the laudanum and water at once, but let it remain a minute, or until the stinging sensation that is causes grows less. Immediate relief is generally given by this simple treatment. It must be done deliberately and thoroughly, if the symptoms are not checked by the first trial, repeat it a few times at intervals of half an hour, and keep within doors, if possible, for a day. I have often practiced this operation on myself and on patients, if carefully done, and promptly, it will break up a cold in the head before it has a chance to get a fair start. A sniff to time saves nine. But if this treatment is put off later, it is of no use, for the inflammation of the nasal passages soon takes firm hold, and the cold passes on into what I have called the incurable stage, or which there is little to be done except to palliate the sufferer's discomforts.

When the cold commences in the throat, what shall we do? Tie up the throat in a piece of flannel (red or any other color—the color makes not the least difference), and by all means stay at home if possible. If you know by experience that the cold threatens to be a severe one, take ten grains of Dover's powder, and some warm drink (the better if gently stimulating, though I do not urge this upon total abstainers), and go to bed as early as may be. You have an even chance of being well, or much better at least, in the morning. A good perspiration always helps the cure.

If the cold begins in the bronchial tubes, the above measures should be taken without delay, and, in addition, a mustard poultice should be applied to the upper part of the chest, and kept on until the skin is red, but not long enough to blister. A towel or a linen bandage around the throat, wet with tepid water, often does much good, it should be kept on through the night, and covered with a piece of flannel to check the escape of moisture. In winter keep the room at an even temperature of about 70°—not higher.

So much for treatment at the outset. Now a word upon the other point mentioned.

2. How to prevent a cold from running on indefinitely, or turning into something worse—Many persons find relief by a tonic treatment from the start, as by quinine as less. But a physician's advice should always be had by those who find that their colds are likely to hang on. No hard-and-fast rules can be laid down. The main points are, first, to avoid unnecessary further exposure to cold, second, to get competent treatment adapted to the individual case; and third, as a means of prevention, to give special care to the question of how to clothe one's self, winter and summer, in this most trying climate. I will only say, on this point, that there is no greater superstition among intelligent people than that of going with the neck unprotected or cold weather. This exposure will do for the very robust, but for nobody else. But the question how to dress in our variable climate is one that requires a paper to itself. TIMOTHY MERRICK CHAN.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Ton Philadelphia parson who published a marriage notice with the addition, "No fee for the minister; empty envelope dodge," may have met with newise haste. A preacher in Indiana has recently received a letter containing one hundred dollars, with the explanation that it came from a man whom he had married when he was too poor to pay for the service, but who had prospered abundantly, and was willing to pay a liberal interest on the original obligation.

The Hartford Courant takes the law-makers in Washington to task for using the alleged word "auto-mobile" with reference to torpedoes. It says that "auto-mobile" is an improper combination of Greek and Latin roots, and suggests that "self-moving" would convey the meaning which the etymological monstrosity is intended to convey.

Plans have been presented to the Light-house Board in Washington for erecting an electric light tower at the entrance to Hell Gate A similar tower is or use at the entrance to the harbor at Savannah. It is expected that the board will decide at the meeting to be held this month whether the project shall be further considered.

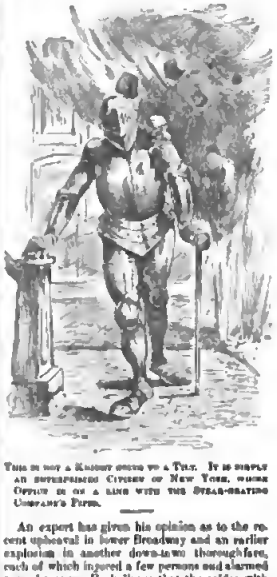
The government has been exerting itself in behalf of pole-boat navigation of the Savannah River above Augusta. The engineers have already expended $24,000 in blasting out rocks and building side dams, and the last River and Harbor Bill appropriated $15,000 more for the work. One of the engineers has now discovered that if this money be expended, the current may be made so strong that boats one not be poled up the stream. In that event the strong current would do away with the necessity of poling boats down the stream, and the interest of pole-boat navigation on the Savannah would receive a serious blow. It is a great thing to know when to stop fostering a tender industry.

It has been decided by an Oregon judge that Chinese miners are not laborers, and that they may be permitted, therefore, to enter the United States, under the law recently enacted, without passports. When the wages of miners have been reduced to a mere pittance through the competition of Chinese cheap "Hamlets" and Orientel ham-fatters, perhaps he will see and acknowledge his error.

Much solicitude for the welfare of the sloths in Central Park was awakened by the extremely cold weather of a few weeks ago, and it was suggested that the stone be protected from the cold by a sheathing of glass, so that a museum be built around it with a dome lofty enough to protect the monolith—something after the manner of the circus wagon in which the giraffe is carried. Advice was sought from those who were informed as to how Egyptian obelisks are affected by low temperatures, and their assurances that the precious stone was in no danger allayed the anxiety. It was learned that the Paris monolith was covered with a transparent varnish when it was first brought from Egypt, but that protection was allowed to crumble off, and the shaft has stood the wear and tear of the weather as well without it as with it. Commander Gorringe, who brought the obelisk across the sea, says that it will probably be five thousand years before the hieroglyphics are beaten off by the weather, and he thinks that this period, added to the present age of the shaft, will be a very respectable age for an inscription.

The young Democratic reform Governor of Pennsylvania has discarded the title of His Excellency, and given orders that he shall be styled simply The Governor. This preference was made known to the State Senate through his private secretary, who was instructed to present communications so coming from "The Governor," and not from "His Excellency the Governor." Displeased Pennsylvanians are preserving the term by sarcastic references to "His Excellency the Governor's private secretary."

A newspaper tells how "a good breakfast can be prepared from the remains of yesterday's dinner, providing they consisted in part of roast mutton." What the exigencies of the hour demand is a recipe for making a good breakfast from the remains of yesterday's dinner when that repast consisted solely of reminiscence.



THIS IS NOT A RAILWAY GUIDE TO A TRAIN. IT IS SIMPLY AN ENTERTAINING CITIZEN OF NEW YORK, WHOSE OFFICE IS ON A LINE WITH THE STEAM-HEATING COMPANY'S PIPES.

An expert has given his opinion as to the recent upheaval in lower Broadway and an earlier explosion in another down-town thoroughfare, each of which injured a few persons and alarmed a good many. He believes that the solder with which the lengths of gas pipe were joined was melted by the heat radiated from the underground steam-pipes, and that the released gas followed the line of the pipes till it found a receivoir to the man-hole where the intersecting steam-pipes are connected In one case the explosion was caused be the lighting of a match by a workman who thought he smelled gas—a workman usually strikes a match when he thinks he smells gas—and or the other case the cause of the explosion remains a mystery The expert believes that similar explosions may occur at any time till the heating pipes and the gas-pipes shall have been separated, or till the soldered joints of the latter shall have been replaced with connections that will not be destroyed by heat. The somewhat laborious and costly task of providing a remedy has not been begun, and is not likely to be for some time. Meanwhile New-Yorkers who have occasion to go about down-town will not know at what moment on inquiring laborer may strike a match and send them "hiting" with pavving-stones and other debris toward the tops of the tall buildings, or when some unknown and mysterious agent of ignition may treat them to a film surprise. Uncertainty in the minds at the majority to to where the under-ground steam-pipes are located will stimulate conjecture as to when and where the catastrophe is to take place. Meditation in this line will recall the fact that at frequent intervals beneath the sidewalks are large boilers, in charge of janitors, or without care, and will recall the circumstances of the explosion of one of these boilers not many months ago. Walking in the middle of the street in out of the question, except at dead of night, when trucks and cages are not running. There seems to be nothing for the man to do whose business requires him to go about on foot down-town but to revise his expectations so to longevity, and to endeavor to so live that he may be at all times prepared for the worst. To clamber on or heaps of paving stones or barriers of iron and wooden pipes piled up, or to tumble into excavations, was annoying, but it seems that the steam-pipes were such less a source of danger when the streets were torn up to receive them than they are other the system has been perfected.

COMING HOME AT LAST.

[On the proposed removal of the remains of John Howard Payne to this country.]

By WILL CARLETON.

I.

[illegible] banishment was overlong,
But it will soon be past;
[illegible] man who wrote Home's sweetest song
Is coming home at last!
For years his poor abode was seen
In foreign lands alone,
And waves have thundered loud between
This singer and his own.
But he will soon be journeying
To friends across the sea,
And grander than of any king
His welcome here shall be!

II.

He can not come with cheerful brow
And step of conscious pride;
He will not hear the tributes now
That fall [illegible]
And when we [illegible]
Sad strains [illegible]
He can not tell [illegible]
The yearning [illegible]
And silently [illegible]
Like the [illegible]
Who gave a tempest [illegible]
And thrilled the [illegible]

III.

He wandered o'er the dreary earth,
Forgotten and alone;
He who could teach Home's matchless worth
Ne'er had one of his own.
'Neath winter's cloud and summer's sun
Along the hilly road,
He bore his great heart, and had none
To help him with the load;
And wheresoever in his round
He went with weary tread,
His sweet pathetic song he found
Had floated on ahead!

IV.

He heard the melodies it made
Come pealing o'er and o'er
From royal music bands that played [illegible]

V.

His banishment was overlong,
But it will soon be past;
The man who wrote Home's sweetest song
Shall have a home at last!
And he shall rest where laurels wave
And fragrant flowers twine;
His sweetly kept and honored grave
Shall be a sacred shrine;
And pilgrims with glad eyes grown dim
Will fondly bend above
The man who sang the triumph hymn
Of earth's divinest love.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS—THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

The London School Board has once more been chosen at the triennial election, and the friends of the most liberal form of education have again obtained a majority of the members. Mr. Buxton is chosen chairman, and the policy of the board will be unchanged. Its tendency is to free and unsectarian instruction. A small charge is still made to parents who can pay, but not to the very poor. The board schools are, like our own, unsectarian, but some religious instruction is given. The English system embraces two kinds of schools—the voluntary and the board schools. The voluntary are sectarian schools, supported chiefly by the English Church and the Roman Catholic, aided by large grants from the public funds. They equal in number the board schools, and owe their chief support to religious zeal. But they have grown up slowly within the last ten years as an opposing influence to the unsectarian schools, and their friends in London have constantly aimed at each election to gain a majority in the ruling board. In this they have been as constantly defeated. But it is asserted by the Standard and other Conservative newspapers that they have gained in strength, and made some progress toward their aim in the recent election. They claim that the board schools and the [illegible] Board [illegible] [illegible] New York [illegible] American education. [illegible] the recent [illegible] now Bishop of Manchester, and others [illegible] United States have had an important influence upon English education.

The London School Board is composed of fifty-three members. They are elected by the tax-payers, male or female, from the different districts of the metropolis. They have under their care three hundred thousand children, and the number increases rapidly. They have never as yet been able to provide for all the children of the city; many are still without school room; the wonderful growth of London outsteps their efforts. But they boast that they are fast overtaking the wants of the community, and will at last provide for them all. The School Board is made up of clergymen, intelligent women, working-men, teachers, members of Parliament and of the House of Lords. Its first chairman, Lord Lawrence, brought to its aid the energy and honesty of purpose which had marked his successful career in India. He and his associates in 1871 laid the foundation of the remarkable educational edifice. His successor, Sir Charles Reed, followed out the policy of the [illegible] good [illegible], and planted schools all [illegible]. His labors were incessant and invaluable. He [illegible]. The friends of the voluntary schools [illegible] of extravagance and even waste; they [illegible] that London needed so many schools; they offered to supply all its wants with [illegible] schools. But the School Board sent out its intelligent agents into all the worst districts of the metropolis, and soon proved to the public the necessity of a rapid reform. They showed that the voluntary schools were wholly unable to meet the wants of the people, and that where they existed they were often unfit to educate and improve. They pointed out great numbers of children who never entered a school. Their arguments and their facts were conclusive, and the people sustained their liberal policy. When Sir Charles Reed died in the midst of his honorable labors, he was succeeded by Mr. Buxton, the present chairman of the board. Mr. Buxton is a leader in the advanced methods of education. But it is not only the chairman, but almost every member of the board, whose labors have been untiring and incessant. It is said that the members of the School Board are even more industrious than their teachers.

At the recent election the friends of the School Board united to give strength and intelligence to its membership. A committee was formed to guide the opinions of the voters. It was composed of Lord Aberdare, Sir John Lubbock, and Mr S. Morley. Mr Fawcett, the Rev. B. Davies, Miss Shaw, Mrs. Anderson, the Duke of Westminster, the Earl of Derby, and a varied list of men of intellect, nobles, working men, and cultivated women. It was a true democracy of the mind, a union of various classes of intellect to one honorable aim. The committee issued an appeal to the people. They reminded them that the industrial power of the country rested upon knowledge, and that the working-man, of all others, required a thorough education. They strove to arouse the interest of the voters by personal solicitation. They selected candidates of real merit, chiefly those who had been members of the old board, and they succeeded in their aim of defeating the efforts of the reactionary party, and of placing in office persons devoted and faithful to the cause of popular instruction.

The example of London is encouraging to the friends of education everywhere. It shows that the dullest conservatism can no longer resist the advancing power of knowledge. The great capital is resolved not to linger behind its sister cities in intelligence, and is laboring to educate all its people, and the most promising trait of modern politics is the general spread of education. Nations seem once more united in one common aim. It is a crusade against ignorance. It is a pacific rivalry and contest that may and is securing everywhere the solid victories of peace.

EDWARD LAWRENCE.

ARCHBISHOP HUGHES.

On page 89 will be found an illustration of a part of the ceremonies which attended the interment of the remains of the late Archbishop Hughes beneath the middle altar of St Patrick's Cathedral in Fifth Avenue. The remains had been removed to the Cathedral from the church in Mott Street on Monday, January 29, and the funeral services, which took place the next morning, attracted an immense audience. The casket containing the remains was placed on a catafalque in the central aisle. It was covered with a black pall edged with white. There were on flowers or other funeral emblems on the casket, and nothing but the Archbishop's mitre at the top of the casket told that it was the funeral of a high priest. The chancel rail and the pulpit were draped with black, presenting a vivid contrast to the white arches in the body of the church, and the massive blocks of stone in the roof over the vestry, to which the bright sunlight streaming though the windows gave the appearance of blocks of gold. Hundreds of candles burned on the altar, and priests o earing rich vestments moved to and fro on the green carpet of the sanctuary. All the aisles were crowded with ladies and gentlemen, and there was no place unoccupied except by the catafalque, around which four arches of candles burned.

Cardinal McCloskey, although in feeble health, occupied his throne, and took part in the services, and there were present six bishops and a large number of the Roman Catholic clergy of New York and other cities. The services were very impressive. In his funeral sermon Mgr. Preston dwelt chiefly on the ecclesiastical career of the Archbishop, whose memory he eulogized in terms of warm affection and of reverence.

Our artist represents the Cardinal in the act of performing absolution, after which the casket was carried to its final resting-place beneath the high altar of the Cathedral.

MUSICAL CREATURES.

In some parts of the o orld there is a superstition that fish can be attracted to the surface of the water by music, and it is an uncommon spectacle to see an Indian standing in the bow of his canoe with spear poised, while his companion—usually a child—elicits a few plaintive notes from a reed at intervals. Such o notion is, of course, absurd, since fish give very few signs of hearing proper, and are only affected by sounds of such violence that, communicating their vibration to the water, they can be appreciated by common sensibility, just as a person who is "stone-deaf" can perceive and experience o disagreeable sensation as the report of a cannon near at hand. Tame fish confined in an aquarium may not be alarmed at the most boisterous movements as moderately loud noises close to them, but if the glass be thin, the slightest tap will cause them to flash away.

It is curious that the so-called "singing fish" of the Indian Ocean and [illegible] unknown to naturalists [illegible] the fish itself may be known, [illegible] sound is, but the particular species which emits the remarkable sounds has not been identified, nor has the precise manner of their production been discovered; though many hypotheses have been framed. I have heard them on several occasions at still nights, lying at anchor off Greytown—a rhythmical, monotonous, but not unmusical twanging, like the stroke of a Jew's-harp, faintly heard on deck, but loudly audible in the hold, especially of an iron ship, and proceeding apparently from directly underneath her keel. Black sailors attribute a supernatural origin to these blabbings, and declare that they are caused by seamen who have found a watery grave trying to get back into the vessel. I believe that nothing would induce a negro to go below when this harmonious humming is heard.

The venomous tarantula was said to be rendered docile and harmless by music, while the dancing paroxysms of its bitten victim were immediately exorcised by soothing melodies. In an old medical volume I find the bite of this insect to be characterized, amongst other symptoms, by "mournful complaints when questioned, a melancholy look, and the patient points to his breast"; also, that "the symptoms usually return the next year," and that "music is reputed the sole cure; but this must be of a particular kind, which can only be found out by trial." Unfortunately, trial has found out the impotence of the salmagundi often instead of the particular kind of tune requisite for their remedy.

The [illegible] Extract from the Annual Report of the Mutual Life [illegible] January 15, 1883.

The [illegible] system under the Mutual Life [illegible] does not extend the sphere of its operations [illegible] This security [illegible] indeed, practically [illegible] from the [illegible] risks, upon classes of risks in the advantages which insurance is thus applied to affords. While it is alleged that [illegible] companies [illegible] for their interest in extended their business in the West Indies, Central and South America, and [illegible] remote and [illegible] tries, this company has seen no reason to change its [illegible] action in regard to the area of territory in which the business of life insurance may be safely conducted by a company of this State.

The [illegible] to the extension of its business to foreign countries are chiefly these: That it has not appeared to be fair and equitable to introduce into a mutual company risks on lives exposed to especially deleterious climatic influences, the effect of which would be to impose the equilibrium which ought to prevail among all the members of a company, where reciprocation of hazard and of advantage should be a ruling principle. It would be unjust to place persons of distinctly different race, habits and residence upon the same plane; in other words, the healthy,

This [illegible] does not seem wise to subject the business of this Company, in any degree whatever, to the operation of the laws—however arbitrary and oppressive they may be made—of such countries. The creation of obligations in a foreign country may be regarded as a warrant for the assumption by that country of the direction and control, in some degree of the reserved funds designed to insure the fulfilment of such obligations. Such complications may at any moment arise out of the remoteness of the field of action offers temptations and facilities for frauds, and augments the difficulties of expense.

That the home field affords ample scope for the employment of whatever capacity and energy any company may possess, a field within which this Company has organized and maintained a business greater than any similar business in the world, and which yet presents a growth and development, ample resources for a safe and prudent expansion of their business. These are among the reasons why the glittering allurements to enter into foreign countries have not seemed to outweigh the possible perils and disadvantages.

VALENTINES TO ORDER.

By ANNIE ROBERTSON MACFARLANE

The rivalry of Professor Weaver and Mr Frank King for the favor of Miss Violet Hazen began at a Sunday-school picnic.

Violet had just come home from Europe, where, broadly speaking, she had been receiving a liberal education for five years past.

Mrs. Hazen had chosen to introduce her daughter to the village at this semi-monastic festival, partly to start her with the prestige of a serious supporter of Presbyterian institutions, and partly to remove a prejudice entertained against herself for having educated Violet in foreign capitals. In making the experiment she had not been without some nervous doubt of the result, as Violet had been tactful, had made a conquest of the first deacon and his wife, and through them, of the whole village. Late in the afternoon [illegible] mother and daughter had managed to slip away from the attentions of exulting admirers, Mrs. Hazen asked, "How do you like it, Violet?"

Violet was curled up on a rock in the middle of a shallow stream, and shaking her wet hands in the air. A gleam of mischievous intelligence shot from her blue eyes. "I don't know, mamma. Is it not a little dull?"

VIOLET COMPARES THE VALENTINES.—DRAWN BY ALFRED FREDERICKS.

Mrs Hazen looked equally intelligent. "No. If there is anything [illegible] it is not dull."

As she spoke the [illegible] them parted, and Mr Hazen, Professor Hazen, was vigorously hailed—stepped out, followed by Professor Weaver and Mr Frank King.

From that moment there was a struggle for more than the privilege of escorting Violet's parasol, more even than that of pouring into a pretty and sympathetic ear personal joys, sorrows, and opinions. It was a modern contest à l'outrance for the prize of a fair woman. For six months the village followed the affair with unflagging interest. People said, and not without reason, that both President and Mrs Hazen favored Professor Weaver, and what greater approval a New England village permits itself to give to any individual was given to him. He might be a fresh old fool for Violet, and perhaps his clothes were not as stylish as a girl who had lived "abroad" would wish her husband to wear, but then his learning was profound, his private income [illegible] some, and his principles in themselves were solid personal property.

As for Frank King—well, there was nothing against Frank King except that he was young, and [illegible] being "not the," perhaps about his good looks, perhaps about his [illegible] his pleasant manners, perhaps about his [illegible] seems having been Governor of the State.

But if youth and manly beauty and winning ways had [illegible] a man in a village given over to the [illegible] of criticism, they seemed to Professor Weaver to give [illegible] man an [illegible]

THE DEMOCRATIC BLUNDER.

THE evident disposition of the Democratic party to assume the election of the autumn as a simple party victory strikingly illustrates the political situation. The unanimity of the majority against the Republican ticket in New York, where the result of the election was most conspicuous, was the conclusive proof that it was not a party victory. Immediately after the election this was frankly confessed by leading Democrats everywhere in the country. The palpable truth was acknowledged. The election signified Republican discontent. But it did not signify preference of the Democratic party. As, however, it brought that party into power, it offered it an excellent opportunity to prove whether such preference would be justified. This was the sole result of the election, and the Democrats, in this State at least, have hastened to show that they totally misunderstand it. Six weeks of the session of the Legislature, of which they command a great majority, have passed, and they have shown that they regard the election as a mere party victory. The logic is simple. The Democratic candidate, Governor CLEVELAND, received an immense majority, consequently the Democratic majority may do what it pleases. Its fortune is much too large to be squandered even by the most reckless waste. This is the Democratic blunder.

During the six weeks of the session the Democratic majority has shown its hostility to reform, and without abolishing offices which it has denounced as needless it has clutched at all the spoils of patronage possible. In two ways could it have won public confidence, by aiming plainly and actually both at economy and reform; but both of these courses it has disdained. The other day a bill was declared passed in the Assembly by a bare majority. The declaration was instantly challenged, and it appeared that three affirmative votes were recorded which had not been cast. This is not the kind of performance which helps a party. We are already well advanced in the second month of the session, and intelligent Democrats will agree that their party has done nothing whatever to win to its support a single one of the vast army of Republican voters which permitted the Democratic success at the polls. It has shown both an unwillingness and an incapacity to grasp the situation. The party can hope for little aid from Governor BUTLER in Massachusetts, and when Congress and the Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania shall have adjourned, we shall be greatly mistaken if the Democrats have not demonstrated conclusively their unfitness to be trusted with national power.

On the other hand, the Republicans have shown a disposition to heed the signs of the times. They responded promptly and satisfactorily, in the Message of the President and in the passage of the reform bill, to the demand of the country, and they are engaged in revising the tariff. In this work, as we said last week, neither party engages with zeal, because of the bitter conflict of interests, and of the doubtful party result of changes. But the Republicans must know that failure to fulfill the popular expectation of reduction of taxation will aid Democratic hopes by chilling Republican sympathy. Party indifference upon one side is party advantage upon the other, and it would be singular if the sagacity which inspired Republican councils at the opening of the session should desert them before the end. Nothing, however, is more certain than the uncertainty of the political situation, except that the Democratic party has thus far misused the enormous opportunity which the elections gave it. When JEFFERSON became President he said that the first duty of his party was to break up the Federal party by Republican moderation. It would be interesting and novel to see a party which delights to profess Jeffersonian principles occasionally indulging in Jeffersonian practice.

A SENSIBLE BILL.

IT is the boast of Englishmen that their political system brings the government nearer to the people than ours. Parliament meets very soon after the election of its members, and if the ministry, which is the Executive power, is not supported by Parliament, it resigns, or appeals to the country by a dissolution and a new election. In this way the popular will is executed with as little delay as practicable. But our system presents the anomaly and, from the representative point of view, the absurdity, of Representatives who have been dismissed by the people assembling to make laws for the country. And as the House of Representatives is elected in November, and does not generally meet until a year from the following December, it may even happen that a House may be discredited before it has entered upon its duties, by the result of the State elections in the autumn following its own election.

This peculiarity of our system has often arrested attention, and there is no doubt that it is felt to be a great inconvenience if not injury to the public service. Unquestionably it prevents the prompt response of legislation to the changes of public sentiment. The theory of the delay is that time was thought to be necessary for making acquaintance with constituencies and learning parliamentary procedure. But this was inconsistent with the doctrine that government is not a mystery to which adepts only are equal, but a business for which every fairly instructed citizen is competent, and also with the theory that a representative in a popular legislature is but one member of a community selected by his neighbors because of his familiarity with its affairs. However plausible such a view may have been at the organization of the government, experience has shown that there is nothing gained and much risked by the long delay between the election of a Representative and the beginning of his duties, and a bill to correct the anomaly has been introduced in Congress.

The bill provides that the Forty-ninth Congress, for which the elections will take place in November, 1884, shall meet for its first session on the 5th of March, 1885, which is the time at which its term technically begins, and that the second session shall begin in January, 1886. The result of this arrangement would be simply that the meeting of the new Congress would promptly follow its election, and no Representative would serve after he had been rejected. The propriety of such an arrangement is obvious, and it is not easy to perceive what valid objection there can be to it. The long delay between the election and the meeting of Congress is universally regarded with wonder, and no sound reason has been offered for it. But the change is one of those simple and useful details of legislation for which Congress seems to have no time and no taste. The Senate, indeed, has passed the bill for the Presidential succession in the cabinet, but the grave question of counting the electoral vote—one of the gravest of possible questions, involving the peaceful succession of the government—still awaits action.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE REFORM BILL.

THE appointment of the Civil Service Commission has been long delayed, but, according to reports from Washington, it is possible that the nominations will be made before this paper is issued. The matter is of general importance, because the persons selected and the circumstances of the selection will indicate to the country whether the reform bill is to be carried out in its spirit to secure the best results possible. The general purposes of the bill and the general principles upon which it is founded have been publicly approved by the President. In his last Message he pointedly called attention to the fact that there was a general desire for definite reform in regard to appointments, and that in his own judgment the term and tenure of office should be regulated neither by zeal in the service of a party nor by fidelity to the fortunes of an individual, and that business places should be filled upon business principles. Such assertions in a Message to Congress are in the nature of solemn public engagements, which could not be violated without serious injury to the President, and great disappointment to the country.

There is no reason to anticipate such disappointment except delay in applying the principles to certain offices the term of which has expired—a delay which gives color to disagreeable rumors from Washington. As an illustration we may take the case of Naval Officer BURT. He is one of the most experienced and accomplished customs officers in the country, against whose official and personal character and conduct nothing can be said. He is, besides, one of the most intelligent and efficient friends of the reformed principles of administration which the President has adopted as his own, and his effective application of them in the Naval Office has thoroughly vindicated the sagacity and practicability of those principles, and furnished one of the most conclusive arguments for the passage of the reform bill by Congress. By his probity, knowledge, experience, and energetic executive talent, Mr. BURT's conduct of the Naval Office has gained for it official commendation as standing among the very best-ordered offices in the country. Mr. BURT has naturally applied for reappointment, but it is announced that he is to be nominated as a member of the Commission. In itself the nomination might be viewed as a proof of the President's sincerity and earnestness in promoting the reform, provided that Mr. BURT's present position were filled in accordance with sound principles, by his efficient deputy. But to transfer Mr. BURT to the Commission, and replace him in the Naval Office by an inexperienced politician, however excellent a man he might be, would necessarily discredit all that the President has said, because it would be evident that the object of the change was, not to secure Mr. BURT for the Commission, but to place a politician in the Naval Office—a proceeding which would be in flagrant violation of the very purpose for which the Commission was created. The transfer could be properly made only for reasons of benefit to the public service. But it would not be pretended that the public service would be benefited by superseding the Naval Officer, not for public but for political and personal reasons.

It is true that the present Naval Officer is not the only man in the country capable of filling that position. But this fact is not an argument for superseding him by an officer of less experience in the duties of the post, who would also introduce politics into a business office, and who would not heartily co-operate with the work of the Commission. Mr. BURT or any other friend of reform might well hesitate to accept an appointment to the Commission if offered under circumstances which would justify a belief that the bill is not to be carried out in good faith. The bill places the work of the Commission under the complete control of the President, and if his action in regard to appointments elsewhere compelled doubts of his intentions, any friend of reform might properly decline to serve as a blind. We speak plainly because of the singular delay, and of the rumors of a "checker" which would greatly disappoint public expectation in regard to the President's action. But we trust that all doubts will be happily dispelled before this paper appears.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

WHEN GAMBETTA died M. WADDINGTON said that the Republic had nothing to fear but from itself. Those who thought that the death of one man would imperil France were told that France had passed beyond her political nonage. But GAMBETTA had not been dead a month when France seemed to tremble upon the edge of some kind of "crisis." JEROME BONAPARTE is not a man who commands the confidence even of the Bonapartist faction; and he has no personal prestige or ascendency. But his placard criticising the Government and teeming with French rhetoric, in the staccato style of which DE GIRARDIN was a master, has thrown the country into a panic. This of itself is an indication of its unstable political condition.

It is not easy to tell whether the apprehension is due to a general feeling of the incompetency of the GRÉVY administration, or to some knowledge of factional organization, or merely to the mercurial temper of the people. There have been great financial extravagance and little apparent ability in the conduct of affairs, and such a situation furnishes tempting texts to the factions. Of these the royalist faction is divided into Legitimists, Orleanists, and Imperialists, and it is, altogether, large. But it is not united. The Count of Paris "has been to Frohsdorf," which means that the Orleanists are politically friendly to the older branch of the family. But both the older and the younger BOURBONS are hostile to the parvenu Corsican Empire. These conflicting elements inevitably perpetuate agitation, and at every political juncture startle apprehension. The Republic, on the other hand, has always seemed to be distrustful of itself, while it is regarded with suspicion by the Whites on the right and the Reds on the left, and has apparently needed some powerful and popular personality like that of GAMBETTA to assert its supremacy over all factions.

LABOULAYE was always of opinion that the French did not comprehend the constitutional republican principle. They do not understand, he said, that it is the protection of the minority. The French, he declared, call the despotism of a mob the will of the people. He was in despair, and voted at the last plebiscite for the Empire. His feeling was doubtless shared by many Frenchmen; but whether the Republic does not understand itself, and had only a personal basis in GARIBALDI, will soon appear. It has certainly no other representative personality. If it stands the present strain, it will be because of a loyalty to the order of established law which will show remarkable political progress in France, and indicate the close of "the revolution." When France can safely emerge from a political crisis without a practical dictatorship, she will have passed the final stage of republican development. That is the test to which the country is now exposed, and with the anarchists and communists on one side, and the royalists of all kinds and degrees upon the other, the test will be severe. But every American will wish the French Republic a happy deliverance.

THE PETITION TO COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

THE petition presented to the trustees of Columbia College respectfully asking them "to consider how best to extend, with as little delay as possible, to such properly qualified women as may desire it, the many and great benefits of education in Columbia College, by admitting them to lectures and examination," was received by the board with the courtesy that was to be expected of so dignified and intelligent a body, and which was due to the extraordinary weight of the petition.

It is signed by 1,358 persons, and is a very remarkable document. The signatures include those of the most conspicuous representatives of the conservative, educated, intelligent, religious, and progressive sentiment of the city, and it can not fail to impress the trustees as a significant expression of the conviction and desire of the community with which they are familiar.

The moderate and grounded terms of the application, and the freedom of the well-known petitioners from what are thought to be extravagant and unreasonable views, the movement of enlightened opinion both in England and in America upon the subject, and the action of the English universities, so well in all of many of our own chief colleges, in extending the opportunities of education to women, together with the character of the select committee of the trustees appointed to report upon the premises, justify the expectation that the subject will be duly and carefully considered, and that the question involved will be treated in a manner and to a result worthy of the renown of Columbia College, and of the pride with which this community regards it.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

NEXT week HARPER'S WEEKLY will begin the publication of a series of papers by Professor W. G. SUMNER under the above title. They will treat with the acknowledged ability of the author, and in his crisp and incisive style, various aspects of the questions of political economy which are full of interest and importance. With the fine touch of a scientific expert the author lays bare the crudeness and shallowness of much that is urged in the name of philanthropy and humanity, and reform, and asserts, upon American and economical principles, the right of the rich to be rich, or, in other words, the right of every man to reap all the legitimate and honorable rewards of his abilities and opportunities.

To assert this is not to defend the abuse of either. To argue that a man not only may but ought to gather the wealth which results from his talent and his fair activities in and to justify wrongs of which rich men or associated wealth may be guilty. But one of the lessons taught by Professor SUMNER is that there are very plausible and common errors as to the remedy of such wrongs. While observing what is called natural right, he is the most zealous advocate of individual freedom in every department of human life, so far as compatible with the equal liberty of others.

For "sentimental" views of human relations the author has no mercy, and sentimental correctives he disdains. But the clearness and good-nature of his strictures are as evident on his sympathy with all normal and thorough ameliorations of progress. Professor SUMNER would not probably say that everything in the best possible in this best possible world, but he would certainly hold that to persecute a wrong as only the first step toward righting it, and that the great social problems can be safely and satisfactorily treated only by the most thoughtful and not by the most superficially impulsive of men. His papers will certainly command wide and interested attention.

TIME'S CHANGES.

THE annual report of the Astor Library states that among the notable gifts of the year is a complete file of the Liberator, from Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS. Mr. PHILLIPS has also presented a very valuable collection of pamphlets to the Boston Public Library. During his long and active career he has accumulated many fugitive works of great and in many cases practically unique historical importance, and he wisely makes proper provision for them himself, and characteristically in a way to secure their widest service to others.

The Liberator is the famous abolitionist journal edited by Mr. GARRISON from the beginning to the end of the anti-slavery conflict. It is the perpetual witness of his fidelity to his own promise when it began—that he would not equivocate, that he would not retreat, and that he would be heard. It is a very desirable possession for any library, but the brief allusion in the reports of the President of the Board of Trustees and of the Superintendent of the Astor Library to the "notable" gift is very suggestive of a change in public opinion.

Men who are not yet old recall the mobs which assailed Mr. GARRISON and Mr. PHILLIPS as the Tabernacle and cloisters in New York, and the fierce denunciations of the anti-slavery attacks and denunciations which had at least the general support of respectable public opinion. Mr. GARRISON is gone, and his lofty pleas in American history to secure. Mr. PHILLIPS, past threescore and ten, quietly deposits in the great library the record of the tremendous moral appeal, whose victory is complete, and with a touch his eloquence will be always associated, and the public opinion which a generation ago hounded such men as incendiary fanatics does not now deny them the name of patriots.

HAWTHORNE AND THE WAR.

THE position of HAWTHORNE during the civil war has been always thought to be doubtful. But at a late college supper of old graduates of Bowdoin, Commodore HORATIO BRIDGE, a life-long friend of HAWTHORNE, made an exceedingly interesting speech, and ended by reading a letter from his old friend which shows how sound HAWTHORNE'S views were. Commodore BRIDGE said of him:

"He was always a Democrat in principle, but was neither extreme nor narrow in his views. Nor did he ever take an active part in political controversies. Doubtless he expressed himself to me as unreservedly as to any one, and I am sure that he always took broad and liberal views of the great questions which divided the country. From the commencement of the war HAWTHORNE'S patriotism was thoroughly roused, and his Puritan blood was up; but his mind was too penetrative and clear not to recognize the confusion prevailing in the issues of the hour. The condition of his mind is fully shown in a letter which I found among my papers, and which I think will interest you all. He wrote me, under date of May 26, 1861, laudatorily and closely giving his views. After an urgent invitation to his new home, 'The Wayside,' he writes thus:

"'The war, strange to say, has had a beneficial effect upon my spirits, which were flagging woefully before it broke out. But it was delightful to share in the heroic sentiment of the time, and to feel that I had a country—a consciousness which seemed to make me young again. One thing as regards this matter I regret, and one thing I am glad of. The regrettable thing is that I am too old to shoulder a musket myself, and the jovial thing is that JULIAN is too young. He drills constantly with a company of lads, and means to enlist as soon as he reaches the minimum age. But I trust we shall gather the victorious as vanquished before that time. Meantime, though I approve the war as much as any man, I don't quite make out what we are fighting for, or what definite result can be expected. If we punished the South ever so hard, they will love us none the better for it, and even if we subjugate them, our next step should be to cut them adrift if we are fighting for the annihilation of slavery. To be sure, it may be a wise object, and offers a tangible result, and the only one which is consistent with a future union between North and South. A continuance of the war would soon make this plain to us, and we should see the expediency of preparing our black brethren for future citizenship by allowing them to fight for their own liberties, and ed ucating them through heroic influences. Whatever happens next I must say that I rejoice that the old Union is smashed. We never were one people, and never really had a country since the Constitution was formed.'"

THE IMPORTATION OF WORKS OF ART.

WE take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to an article by Mr. F. D. MILLET, in another part of this paper, on the bill recently presented to the House of Representatives by Mr. BELMONT, providing that works of art shall be placed upon the free list. We have reason to believe that Mr. MILLET'S views are shared by the great majority of American artists.

CHARLES B. SEDGWICK.

CHARLES B. SEDGWICK, who died on the 7th inst. at Syracuse, in New York, was one of the ablest among the very eminent lawyers of Central New York, and during the war he was the Representative in Congress from the Onondaga district, serving with great efficiency and distinction on the chairman of the Naval Committee. In the most excited anti-slavery days before the war he was a stanch anti-slavery and Republican leader in his part of the State, and his eagerness and courage were of signal service to the cause.

Mr. SEDGWICK was one of the most modest and reticent of men, but despite his reserve, the wide range of his sympathies and his quick and elegant manner, made him a charming and his gentle and cordial manner, made him a charming companion. The hospitality of his happy home was unbounded, and whatever was lovely and of good report was naturally attracted to his house. A double shadow has fallen upon it within a few weeks, for but a short time before his own death a married daughter, greatly beloved by all who knew her, had died.

For some years Mr. SEDGWICK had been withdrawn from public life, without losing his interest in public affairs. He was one of the men whom any community can ill spare—an admirable representative of that independent citizenship, that quiet, steadfast, intelligent, and honest manhood, which is the sure foundation of great states.

PERSONAL.

PASCAL wrote to EUSEBIUS'S daughter in 1676 "Ever since the year 1653 your father has been in the habit of writing to us, greatly to my comfort and profit, and I certainly never destroyed with my will any scrap of paper his hand had been on."

—On the occasion of her landing in Bermuda, the Princess LOUISE'S baggage consisted of not less than forty-three pieces, including nine cases of wine. The first thing brought ashore was a mocking bird in a cage. Most of the trunks were marked in large white letters, P. L., one of the largest of them disclosed a brass plate inscribed, "Princess LOUISE, Dress Trunk." The Princess was the last of her party to leave the steamboat, and the first to land from the one-boat that took them to the shore.

—Congressman ABRAM S. HEWITT, of this city, now undergoing treatment for the removal of a carbuncle on his back, expressed recently his regret at being absent from Washington during the tariff discussion. "I have made the tariff," he said, "the study of my life, and now when I most desire to contribute my share of light, I am debarred from doing so."

—Sir EDWARD M. ARCHIBALD, the retiring British Consul-General of this city, said his friends at the DELMONICO banquet given recently as his house that he had decided to spend the remainder of his days in New York, "where I have so long found a home and so many warm-hearted [illegible]."

—All sorts of matter relating to JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU are soon to be gathered into a collection for public exhibition in Paris. The display will include manuscripts, portraits, and other curiosities.

—The custom of having an annual Christmas tree has been adopted in some of the palaces of Italy. The Prince of Naples had one last December, and the King and Queen distributed their Non Year's presents from another one.

—In a recent lecture, Monsieur LOUANDRE said that from a literary point of view it is hardly possible to find a book more original or instructive than Don Quixote. No other contained so much that was amusing and accurate, and that, at the same time, appealed to higher emotions. Its moral was that observer operates with Nature, whether untiringly or unwittingly, in certain to get the worst of it. There was no great difficulty in finding out what Nature really is, but when the discovery was so simple, it required great wisdom for most people to avail themselves of it.

—The Spectator thinks that M. RENAN'S Recollections of Infancy and Youth are much franker than SIMON'S autobiography, though with a somewhat similar vein of calm self-complacency. M. RENAN prides himself on having been loved by only four women—his mother, his sister, his wife, and his daughter. A writer in the British Quarterly Review observes that M. RENAN seems to regard Christianity totoh in the same way in which a sentimental journalist might look at a beautiful adventuress—he does not believe in its claims, but he is charmed by its graces.

—Columbia College has sustained a severe loss in the death, on the 6th inst., of Professor CALVIN E. BERNOUN. He was twenty-eight years old, a graduate of Amherst College, and a very accomplished student. His specialty was the science of Administration, for which he had prepared himself at Berlin, Heidelberg, and at the Ecole de Sciences Politiques in Paris.

—King ALFONSO'S sister the Infanta PAZ, aged nineteen, is reported in telegraph from Madrid to speak several languages, to paint so well that her water-colors on recent exhibitions were "much admired," and to be charitable to the poor. —At the opening of the International Art Exhibition at Rome on the 21st of January, a "hymn in praise of art" was sung by a select chorus, accompanied by an orchestra, in the presence of the King, the Queen, and the Crown Prince, the Senators and the Deputies, the foreign ambassadors, the generals, the Knights of the Annunziata, and a crowd of lesser magnates.

—The late H. STANE DOBE (writes a foreign reviewer) manifested a wonderful frugality. A single glass of wine was enough to excite him, and two glasses made him feel "drowsy and lazy," as he said; on that, as a rule, he drank nothing but the milk of cocoanuts, and ate of the simplest dishes. He frequently compared his head to "a witch's cauldron, always boiling and shooting up blue flames."

—The view from the tomb of CAMOENS near Xbee is described as one of the most charming and picturesque of any in the neighborhood. The red-tiled houses and fine villas of modern Xbee lie at the foot of the hill on one side, and on the other the older and more chaotic built part of the city, while in the distance the successive ridges of the hills that inclose the whole city, with the snow-clad Alps behind them glinting in the sun as the morning vapors left.

Those who argue in the affirmative remind their hearers that the members of the Queen's household are required to wear their miniature medals and decorations on the left lapel of the coat when in "household evening dress," that is to say, when attired in dark blue dress coat with brass buttons, white waistcoat, and black trousers. The Prince of Wales, it is said, is very particular to notice such a good-natured reprimand as a departure from the rule.

WINTER SPORTS IN THE ENGADINE.

WINTER SPORTS IN THE ENGADINE.

THE beautiful valley of Engadine, through which the river Inn pursues its winding and picturesque course, has become one of the most popular resorts in Switzerland for tourists of leisure. It is nearly sixty miles in length, and its greatest breadth is only a mile and a half. Lying at an altitude varying from 3500 to 6000 feet above the level of the sea, the climate is so severe that cattle are kept in stall seven months out of the twelve; the only grain raised is rye, and potatoes seldom mature in the brief summer. Yet the inhabitants, numbering about 12,000 souls, are very prosperous, and the valley contains more populous villages than any other Swiss valley lying at so great an elevation. The village dwellings are noted for picturesque elegance as well as comfort. The summer resorts in the Engadine are numerous and well patronized, especially St. Moritz, which is celebrated for its mineral baths, and Tarasp-Bad, on the north bank of the Inn, near the village of Vulpera. A singular feature in the locality are numerous springs from which issue mofette, or jets of carbonic acid gas, destructive to all small animals or birds that come within reach of the deadly fumes.

Winter arrives early in the Engadine, and tourists who remain after the short summer can enjoy skating and coasting at the resorts long before the season for these sports begins in other parts of Europe. Our Illustrations show that the privilege is highly appreciated.

THE FLOODS IN GERMANY.

THE devastation caused by the recent overflowing of the great rivers of Germany and Austria was very great. Vast districts were inundated, villages were swept away, numbers of people were drowned or killed by falling houses, and in many districts farming lands and vineyards were seriously injured. There was wide-spread and lamentable distress among the poor, who found themselves suddenly homeless and starving. The Rhine, the Kasel, and other rivers rose to a height hitherto unknown. At one time the city of Vienna was seriously menaced by the rising flood, and the great strength of the river embankments alone averted a terrible disaster.

Some curious scenes took place in the Zoological Gardens at

POSTAL DELIVERY.

Traffic was suspended until narrow plank sidewalks could be constructed on blocks and stagings, such as are shown in one of our illustrations. Then boats were brought into requisition, and Mayence literally became a navigable city like Venice. Some impatient citizens, unaccustomed to get to their places of business, betook themselves to wash-tubs, and often got a ducking in their attempts to propel these awkward vessels through the water lanes of the city.

As many families were without a stock of provisions, it became necessary to send them food by means of boats. The mails were delivered in the same manner. The bodies of those who died during the time in the inundated parts of the city were

A HOUSE UNDERMINED.

Cologne. About ten o'clock one night, when the water was at the highest point, a river wall gave way under the enormous pressure, and in a moment the whole inclosure was flooded. The attendants, in anticipation of such a disaster, were already at work in the wild beasts' department erecting temporary stagings on which the lions, bears, tigers, and other creatures could take refuge as the water rose. The rush of the flood startled all the animals into an uproar. The bellowing and roaring were hideous. The lions tore at the stagings with teeth and claws, and shook the cage bars in a frenzy of rage and terror. Only the elephants appeared to retain their presence of mind. As the floods rose, these sagacious animals quietly piled up the temporary stage beams and planking in such a way as to secure a footing out of water. At least so says the correspondent of a German newspaper. For some days the keepers paddled round in small boats to feed their charges. They had water enough and to spare.

When the water first began to flow in Mayence and to flood the streets there was a great deal of [illegible], and many who could remain within-doors, over the misfortunes and the plight of those who were obliged to go out. But a few hours later the merriment ceased. The streets became impassable for vehicles [illegible] by boat to the higher portions of the city. Each family [illegible] Many people were with difficulty rescued in boats from their tottering dwellings, losing all but life and the clothes they wore, and a number were swept away and drowned.

VALENTINES TO ORDER.

start in any race—particularly the race for Violet, in the face of which his best running was indifferent.

Fits of self-disparagement and hopelessness often came over the Professor, most frequently when, by the light of the midnight oil, he was demonstrating on paper, let us say, the life that existed several millions of ages before protoplasm. They came with a swift rush of blood to the finger tips, with a resistless force which drove him out into the wide deserted streets, his mind a chaos in which whirled women's faces, all beautiful, and all alike.

To King the power of love brought an element of doubt, an unpleasant self-abasement. The effect of the passion was chastening, and without deliberate plan he found himself living a life above reproach, steadily, spontaneously gravitating toward Violet.

As for Violet, her sentiments and inclinations piqued curiosity and defied speculation. It is possible that she had not taken herself into her own confidence until the day came when she had to answer two letters, received at the same time, and imperatively calling for notice.

Only the concluding sentences of the letters which she that February morning despatched to Professor Weaver and Mr. King need be transcribed:

"I must ask one week for reflection, that is, until next Monday, St. Valentine's Day. And now I am going to make a request which will seem to you both childish and absurd; but I am childish and I am absurd, and it is best that you should see me as I am. And I believe that if by next Monday I should still hesitate, a valentine in original verse, penned under the inspiration of the occasion and the protection of the Saint, would lead me to a decision which would be for your happiness and my own."

Excepting the hour on Monday, the 14th, appointed for the interview, one letter was a copy of the other. The comments of the two men on these remarkable sentences were characteristic. Professor Weaver saw in them the candor and truth which made Violet so dear to him; King detected the spice of audacious mischief which was not the least of Violet's charms for him. But to neither did an argument on the demand suggest itself.

Violet must have an irresistible valentine.

Never did a wider gulf yawn between requirement and possible achievement. Neither of the men had ever written a couplet. In the treatment of the case each man was again true to his individuality. Accepting the spirit of the request, [illegible] denuded the college library of all the poets from Horace down to Swinburne. Every moment that he could snatch from his necessary work was given to the study of true poetry in its idea and its form. On the third night, after struggles compared to which Weller's, of world-wide notoriety, were feeble trifling, he perpetrated the following:

> "O peerless, pitiless Pearl!
> O fierce, cruel and coy!
> O happy, heart-breaking Heart!
> O painful, jingling joy!"

This was the best he could do, and when the dawn crept in through his lattice he knew it would not do at all. What to him was the fame of his treatise on "Fossil Fish," when he could not write a simple rhyming valentine for Violet?

King at once faced his inability to write verses under any inspiration or saintly protection, and therefore he must construe "original" as "originated by any one, if only specially originated for Violet."

Clearly, he need only trouble himself to find the man or woman who possessed a facile trick of rhyme. As his acquaintance numbered a dozen or more "literary fellows," it seemed to him that the quest would be neither long nor fatiguing. An hour after receiving Violet's letter he was on his way to Boston, intending to do two or three hours' work in his office, then look up a poet, dine him, and negotiate the valentine on any terms.

But he went home that night without having happened on that particularly desirable fellow. The second night and the third found his literary need still unprovided. He had, by that time, found and dined Smith, the very man for his dilemma, but [illegible] had not been able to explain his position. It was quite simple to imagine himself saying, carelessly, over a bottle of Burgundy,

"Look here, Smith, reel me off one or three verses—something sweet and fetching—your very best—a valentine for a girl I know."

Who [illegible] describe the complex feeling that tied his tongue in the [illegible] of "that sarcastic brute, Smith," smiling so genially across the table?

King became conscious of a depression of spirits. On Thursday night sleep forsook him, and he took a very early train to the city on Friday [illegible]. He never knew what prompted him [illegible] his [illegible] and fasten them on a conspicuous [illegible] the public from the door of a house in an obscure [illegible]. But [illegible] did so lift and fix his eyes, and standing still, a swift, wonderful hope lighted his inner darkness.

> Valentines! Valentines! Valentines!
> [illegible] to Order!
> In Prose or [illegible] or Comic!
> A perf[illegible] fit [illegible]!
> Step in! Step [illegible]!

Not a moment did King hesitate about accepting [illegible] invitation. He stepped in, he [illegible], and stood breathless [illegible] a [illegible] open [illegible] h[illegible] and [illegible]

[illegible] was entered in this book [illegible] Fanciful, with undertone [illegible] To Violet."

"Your price, sir?" said the agent, eying King sharply over his spectacles.

"Your price?"

"From one dollar to twenty-five. Twenty-five will provide you with an article which would put Shakespeare to the blush."

"All right; twenty-five. I must have it this evening, and will call for it myself."

King felt that if the verses should not turn out presentable, he would on Saturday have to throw himself on the mercy of Smith—Smith, whose rhyme was reliable, but whose jeers were equally so, and, if possible, more telling. At dusk he presented himself and his number before the unlovely emissary of Cupid.

"Hum! 350. Let me see."

The old man took a handful of envelopes from a drawer, muttering large numbers as he ran his wares through his fingers.

"Hum! Yes, here it is. I looked over it myself. I think you will find, sir, that Ben Jonson has been left."

King threw down his twenty-five dollars, and hurried to the street. He was in mortal terror of being seen in the vicinity of the valentine mart. Not till he had turned the key of his own room did he take the treasure from his pocket, and proceed to estimate its worth. As he read, his critical expression mellowed; a smile flickered in his eyes, a smile which presently brightened into the radiance of joy. When he had carefully copied these verses of an unknown bard, and without scruple inscribed his initials in the corner, he seemed to glow with the serene complacence of the wholly virtuous man who by one bold stroke has removed himself from the temptations of an alluring world.

On Saturday morning, when the station platform was crowded with men waiting for the city train, King attached himself to Professor Weaver. Their intercourse had long been distinguished by the punctilious politeness of men who recognize a mutual antagonism of a nature and in a cause which preclude open hostility. This morning all King's formality vanished into thin air; the Professor found him offensively familiar, vulgarly jocose. In order to get rid of King, Weaver had to forego his morning smoke, and, arrived in the city, he actually ran and took refuge in a street car.

He did not know where that car was going; he did not care. When the conductor called "Car stops here," Professor Weaver stepped off—stepped off, of course (why not?), directly in front of that thrice-blessed poster,

"Valentines! Valentines! Valentines!"

The sun seemed to blaze out full upon this melancholy man, giving him generously of his brilliancy. The professional tread became a hop and a skip. In five minutes the old gentleman with whom we are already acquainted had entered in his book:

"Valentine in verse. Fanciful, with undertone of sentiment. To Violet."

"Your price, sir?" peering quizzically at his sharp-natured customer.

"Anything you please. I must have a good thing. No alliterative trash." "Peerless, pitiless Pearl," rang surely in Weaver's ears.

"Well, sir, the best has come, as it were. For thirty dollars, though, you can have lines to a lady which would make Shakespeare or Fletcher, pretty clever fellows at their trade too, groan in his grave."

The Professor silently turned away. As he went down-stairs his cheeks tingled, a great wave of shame sweeping over him—shame that he had even remotely introduced Violet into such a transaction. The torture which he endured that day, in scathing self-accusation, in feeble, contemptuous self-defense, few men know. When he received and paid for his valentine he intended to destroy it at once. He had resolved to go to Violet on Monday and say, "I can love you, and take care of you all my life, but I can not write you a valentine."

So he put the valentine in his pocket, not suspecting the flame that was in it, nor how it could burn. It began to burn before he reached the street. On his journey home it seemed to scorch his heart, near which it lay, and when after dinner he had retreated among his books, the pain of the burning was intolerable.

He snatched the thing then from his pocket, and held it over his wood fire—held it there fearfully, as if it were a red-hot coal that in a moment of madness he had plucked from the hearth, and on the white surface stood out ominously black his number, 777—a lucky number, seven, therefore three sevens must be thrice lucky. Where had Professor Weaver heard that silly saying? Long ago, no doubt, for it came ringing down through weary years, like the echo of some school-mate's laugh, some friend of his childhood, long dead, long forgotten—mocking him too, urging him on to grasp this last hope, to grasp it even at the cost of deception and perjury. With the instinct to seize whatever comes to hand in the crises where happiness or life is at stake, the overwhelming impulse of selfishness which sweeps out of existence debatable rights, Professor Weaver tore open the envelope and feverishly read his valentine.

As he read, principle, intention, resolution, vanished—vanished and made room for triumphant gladness. He felt that if Violet could be won by a valentine, he had it in his power to win her.

So it came about that on the morning of the 14th of February two valentines lay [illegible] Violet's breakfast plate. She opened that addressed in Professor Weaver's handwriting first. As she rapidly scanned the lines, her mother saw in her face a shadow of pain, which deepened, and, as she took up the other valentine, expressed itself: "I am afraid that Frank [illegible]." So Violet [illegible] the [illegible] of her heart. She had barely [illegible] folded King's valentine when the tears that had been in her eyes dried, and an angry flush dyed her face. "Mamma," she cried, scornfully, "I have had a lucky escape, and a narrow one. My valentine caprice was an inspiration. It has saved me from two worthless men. And, oh, mamma, I could not have doubted Professor Weaver's honor! And as for Frank, I can not—can not speak of Frank!"

Before Mrs. Hazen could even surmise a cause for this tempest, Violet had swept from the room.

When at the appointed hour Professor Weaver was shown into Mrs. Hazen's drawing-room he found Violet alone. The mother and daughter had been together all day, and the dismissal of both lovers had been settled. As to the manner of dismissing Professor Weaver, Violet had yielded to her mother, but she had reserved all rights in the treatment of Mr. King.

As the curtains fell behind the Professor he crossed the room to Violet, standing in the bay-window. He held his hat in his hand, and said, gravely, "I have come for your answer."

She answered, "No."

Her eyes met his steadily, and the stinging negative struck his ears like a well-aimed blow, sinking into his heart and thrilling through every nerve. After that there was a silence in the room, and in that silence the girl seemed to the Professor to shrink into the folds of her long soft dress, and to fade away from him into the purple light of the evening, away beyond the level plains of snow.

"Is it final?" he asked at last. "Is there no appeal?"

"None," she said, and flung out her arms as if she would sweep him out of her sight. Professor Weaver turned to leave her. At the door he glanced back. She was looking out the window, and stood with her hands clasped behind her.

He put down his hat then, and recrossed the room. "Miss Hazen, I am not going to trouble you to repeat your answer, nor indeed to give you any pain at all. But I must tell you that the valentine I sent you this morning was not—"

"Spare yourself," she interrupted; "no explanation is needed."

"Then I have only to say good-by. Will you not shake hands with me?"

"No! no! no!" she cried; and thus to Weaver the whole story of the discovery of his imposture was told.

"It was a terrible temptation," he exclaimed, answering all that her violence implied. "And I love you. When a man like me comes to love a woman as I love you he may perhaps forget the demands of truth, and yet not be altogether worthless."

"Then," said Violet, coldly, "he must abide the consequences, since he has tried his method on a woman to whom a love that stoops to untruth is a dishonor."

"You are just," said Weaver; "but if you had loved me at all you would have had mercy. Good-by."

He went away then, and Violet watched him walk down the frozen road. Much pathos there was even in his heavy tread—more in the unconsciously dejected droop of his head; and in his heart was the profound sorrow which, when it strikes such a heart, consumes. But Violet, who was tenderness itself, had no sense of her cruelty, had not even a passing thought for the misery she had inflicted on the man who had just left her. She had promised her mother to dismiss him kindly, and though she had not been quite able to do that, she had spared him explanations. But, after all, that leniency had not sprung so much from consideration for him as from preoccupation touching the coming interview with King. She repeated the Professor's words, "If you had loved me at all you would have had mercy."

Would she? How little he knew! Because she did not love him at all she had spared him. She was saving all her passionate anger for the man she loved.

The twilight was deepening when King came [illegible] Violet could see that he had [illegible] the [illegible] to [illegible] she [illegible] to [illegible] the room to [illegible] and the [illegible]

"Violet!" he [illegible] a quick breath, as if there were nothing more to say.

She took the nearest chair. "Sit down," she said. "You are a charming [illegible]."

King, who was [illegible] in her chilly voice [illegible] the [illegible] He was [illegible] going to [illegible] He followed her and stood before her, resting one hand carelessly on a table. "Never mind the verses; you know I have not come here to talk about them. You know—"

"I know," she broke in, with a flash of anger, "that I will not here you dictate to me what I am to talk about."

The petulance of this ebullition amused King. He smiled down at her a smile so vastly old and tolerant that she lost all control, and blind resentment took possession of her. She sprang to her feet, pulling her two valentines from the velvet pocket at her girdle. She had meant to draw King into a distinct admission touching the verses, and then drive him away with scorn for the lie; but now, in her anger, she held his own valentine close to his eyes. "That is your handwriting?"

"Yes. It is rather dark, but—yes, that is my handwriting." He had drawn his eyes together and squinted at the p[illegible], w[illegible] exasperated Violet still farther.

"These are the verses you wrote for me. Well, I will read them aloud, so that your eyes may not be injured." She went close to the window, and read by the fading light:

> "From a dew-damp, mossy bed,
> Where the ferns faint fragrance shed,
> Peeped a shy maiden.
> Half of heaven, half of earth,
> All the fairies, to her birth
> Tripped with favors laden.
>
> "With sweetness some showered her,
> With beauty some dowered her,
> One bestowed a soul.
> One a spirit pure and true,
> Shining through her eyes dark blue;
> Violet, named the whole.
>
> "'Violet'—forest echoes rang;
> 'Violet'—the blithe birds sang,
> Soaring to the Sun,
> Telling of the deep-hid treasure,
> Made for joy and born a pleasure,
> Waiting to be won.
>
> "The listening Sun believed,
> And in transport quick conceived
> Sought the timid maid;
> Straightway told her of his passion,
> In his ardent, glowing fashion,
> Not one whit afraid.
> "Yet to him no word she said,
> Only bent her flower-like head;
> Then in wrath and pride
> Swift he pressed a burning kiss,
> Crying, 'She shall share my bliss,'
> 'Neath that kiss she died.
> "Pale with misery and fright,
> The Sun sought refuge in the night;
> The fairies came anew,
> Wept and rocked over their child
> Till she looked at them and smiled
> Through tears of glistening dew.
>
> "Then they brought her back to life,
> Vowing her for sweetest wife,
> Not to daring Sun;
> But by him who soft will woo her,
> And with humble prayer will sue her,
> Violet may be won."

"Those are the verses I sent you," he said, as the last line fell quivering from her lips. "And you have added a great deal to the 'rhyme of the poet by the beauty of the voice.'"

She was beside him again, holding up two valentines now. She had not noticed the careful wording of his reply.

"Perhaps you will tell me that this too is your handwriting, and that to amuse and puzzle me you sent me two copies of your original verses. Or perhaps you will tell me that by a singular coincidence two men were at once inspired with one idea and one tongue." She threw her valentines on the floor, and moved back from him, looking at him fiercely. "I should not be surprised—oh no, I should not be surprised at all! There may be other pleasant fictions coming at this moment readily to your lips. There may be other methods with which I am not familiar—methods of tricking, deceiving, lying—"

"Stop there!" he cried, and his hand grasped her arm, then flung it away. He had picked up the sheets of paper, and still held them. He had recognized Professor Weaver's handwriting, and seen at a glance that the verses were identical. He understood the situation, and the conviction that Violet had been temporizing roused in him anger quick as her own. "Listen to me," he went on in a voice that defied resistance. "I have a right to be heard, and I take it. You asked for original verses, and I chose to construe original as written specially for you, no matter by whom. I looked at the request as a whim, but I would do anything to gratify a whim of yours—anything in my power, that is, and as I could not compose a valentine, I had those verses written to order. Another man has had a valentine made to order, and, by great good fortune, the same valentine—Good fortune, I say, because it shows me, and I hope it shows him, that a matter of life and death to us was only fun to you. I have made a mistake. I have loved as a woman a frivolous, heartless child."

"Am I that?" she said, in a husky whisper. "Frivolous, heartless?"—looking up at him as if she were the guiltiest wretch in the world, and he an avenging angel. "I did not mean—I did not know." Then, with a gesture and in a voice [illegible] "What shall I do? what shall I do?" she cried, and fell on her knees, buried her face in [illegible]

Just for a moment King stood looking down at her slight figure, shaken with sobs. He was not thinking that in spite of the hateful valentine he had won, though he felt he had. He was simply filled for once with a consciousness of his own absolute unworthiness, his unfitness to touch or approach the girl on her knees beside him.

But, after all, he lifted her in his arms, and dried her tears, and comforted her; and knowing well the advantage which in that situation a man has, he made full confession of his deliberate [illegible] it. He even expressed sympathy for Professor Weaver. He declared, too, that, for the Professor's sake, putting aside all question of a little personal satisfaction, he would some day seek out and destroy the infamous composer of "valentines to order."

WINTER CLOTHING.

When we want an energetic phrase to describe our winters we call them "Siberian winters," and we think that we are speaking metaphorically. But the winters of our Northern States are actually as cold as those of a considerable part of Siberia. I say nothing of the extremes of Northern Siberia, where the cold weather for the whole Northern hemisphere, so to speak, is manufactured. But while in Western Siberia, except in the high latitudes, mercury does not freeze every year, in nearly all of our Northern States and Territories it freezes (at minus 39° F.) from time to time, though happily not every year. It is thus against winters that may be fairly called Siberian in their severity that we of the Northern States have to protect ourselves. And our winters are not only excessively cold in their extreme temperatures, they are also excessively variable. In none of our Northern or Northwestern States can an equably cold winter be found. How many an invalid has been lured away from his home, never to return, by false promises in this respect!

Our winter climate, then, is (1) a climate of extreme severity, and (2) a climate of extreme variability. The two points which I wish to make about winter clothing depend directly upon these two characteristics.

(1.) The severity of our winters makes woollen clothing essential, and especially flannel under-clothing. Robust persons will get along well enough with the ordinary "mixed under-wear", but in winter flannels are the warmest, in summer they are the coolest, of garments to wear next the skin. How is this paradox explained? The fibres of the wool touch each other but slightly; in other words, the texture of the flannel is loose, and the interstices are filled with air, which is one of the slowest of conductors of heat, so that the warmth of the body is retained—of course by virtue of the entangled air, and not mainly by the fibre of the wool itself. On the other hand, when in summer time the outer clothing is thin, the insensible perspiration which constantly passes through the woollen tissue evaporates readily, and cools the surface of the body. Count Rumford, who made the first important experiments on this subject, says that by wearing flannel "the pores of the skin are disencumbered, and they are continually surrounded by a dry and salubrious atmosphere." He adds that the more general use of flannels would prevent a number of diseases. A poor conductor of heat, a substance that allows the ready escape of perspiration, a comfortable, light, and pliant fabric, and one that it is difficult to wet through, it is by far the best of all materials for under-wear. No other possesses all these good qualities, and it is surprising to find a popular English writer saying, in a recent manual of Health and Occupation, that "for the well-to-do silken under-garments are better than flannel." In what respect? This is the impudence of dogmatism. Whether for the "well-to-do," in the English writer's phrase, or for ordinary people, the pre-eminent value of flannel for under-clothing is well established.

I think that careful housekeepers will thank me for a word about how to treat flannels so as to prevent most of the shrinking which is their one fault, and a fault which prejudices many people against their use.

1. Get a quality of flannel that is a little loosely woven, not of too tight a texture, and buy or cut the garments rather large, allowing about two inches in the length of an under-shirt against the moderate shrinkage that can not be prevented.

2. In washing the flannels do not allow soap to be rubbed upon them, and do not let the garments themselves be scrubbed or rubbed; this felts the material, and makes them shrink. They should be washed by squeezing them in hot and strong suds, and then rinsed out in very hot water. Both to the strong suds and to the very hot water add liquid ammonia in the proportion of a table-spoonful to the gallon. The French housekeepers, who are very practical people, have found out that this is better than borax for the purpose.

3. Do not put the flannels aside wet. Put them out to dry as soon as they are washed and iron them before they are entirely dry, so as not to have to dampen them again. Iron very thoroughly.

Following these rules will prevent nearly all shrinkage.

A word should be added about mixed wear for under-clothing. This is what is generally found in the shops ready made; only in the large towns will you find ready made all-wool under-clothing. A mixture of cotton and wool, if the cotton and the wool are carded together before weaving, [illegible] very well. Canton flannel makes good [illegible] under-clothing. But the all [illegible] the garments are easily made at [illegible] by the seamstress, and they wear so much better than mixed goods that it is economical as well as healthful to use them.

(2.) The second feature of our climate is its variability. The second practical point in winter dress is to dress according to the weather. It is not difficult to adapt at least the outer clothing to the greater or less cold of the day; it requires a little care and forethought, but it is worth the trouble. One may be helped in this matter by the weather bulletins. I trust that I shall not compromise the serious purpose of this paper by giving a bit of advice which will seem droll to some of my readers. It is none the less sound, and it is this: Dress according to the indications of the Signal Service when you can, that is to say, when they are borne out by existing weather. They are generally borne out; the morning papers tell us pretty accurately what sort of weather we are to have during the day, and for all but the most robust persons it is a simple matter of duty to guard against the waves of cold or heat that bear upon us from the West. Is it growing [illegible] when you leave home in the morning, with warning of a cold wave sweeping eastward from St. Paul, and the mercury freezing in Northern Minnesota? Then put on your warmest overcoat, and tie a silk handkerchief or comforter around your neck, and do not forget the woollen stockings. Is it a cold winter's day, with promise of a still higher temperature before night? Then leave the wraps at home; they will be overheating, and make the skin too tender.

In fine, dress according to the actual need of the day, not forgetting what the day may bring forth in the way of a change before its close. Keep warm in the cold, and by keeping always warm enough and not too warm you will defy the doctor for many a day.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

THE IMPORTATION OF WORKS OF ART—MR. BELMONT'S BILL.

The bill recently presented in the House of Representatives by Mr. Belmont, placing on the free list all works of art and objects of artistic and archæological value, is the first notable result of the action taken in November last by the Society of American Artists. This society, after a careful discussion of the subject, passed unanimously a resolution in favor of the abolition of the duty on works of art, and voted to call the attention of Congress and the country to this action. The resolution was widely circulated and much commented upon, and while it has been re-voted by various artistic societies in all parts of the Union, it has been met by no open opposition to its principles.

It is a significant fact that this movement has originated in an organization largely composed of younger members of the artistic guild, most of whom have yet their spurs to win. They have found in their own country a discouraging lack of those influences which surrounded them while they were studying or practising their profession abroad, and they have combined to secure, as near as possible, the same conditions under which they have hitherto found their progress most rapid and their zeal most stimulated. Although America is now one of the best picture markets in the world, it is the one country where it is impossible for a resident artist to profit from the chief advantage of a picture exhibition—comparison of his own works with the best contemporaneous productions. This because no foreign artist can afford to pay a duty of a tenth of the price asked for his picture on the remote chances of selling it in an exhibition, and because no picture dealer can afford to import works of art which are not sure to bring him profit. Further, America is the only country where the artist and the student find a penalty imposed on the prosecution of their studies by the discouragement of the importation of the most valuable aids to artistic development—photographs and engravings of the old and the modern masters, and plaster casts of the masterpieces of sculpture.

Mr. Belmont's bill is so comprehensive in its scope that it will probably meet, in the present excited state of the public mind on the tariff question, some obstruction to its passage; but since it undoubtedly embodies the desires of the artists and the art students of the United States, it seems not unreasonable to expect its final acceptance by Congress. The spectacle of the protected praying for relief from protection is too rare a one not to carry some weight of argument in itself.

The only opposition to this bill which ought to have a hearing will come from some artists who believe that their interests are protected by a tariff on the importation of works of art. They fear foreign competition, forgetting that scores of American artists who have chosen to reside in Europe have their full share of success there, forgetting that American pictures in the Salon and in the Royal Academy are often among the most notable works in those exhibitions—forgetting, in fact, that the moment native works can be compared with the rank and file of European productions, that moment the present fashion in favor of the foreign canvas will begin to wane. The ordinary cry against the free entry of works of art is that the abolition of the tariff will cause the country to be flooded with foreign rubbish. Certainly the opinion of any American artist who confesses to a fear of competition with this so-called foreign rubbish is scarcely worth taking on this question. Further, the duty of ten per cent. ad valorem does not prevent the importation of this class of pictures; it only prohibits the exhibition of a higher class of works, which can not be brought to this country at great expense [illegible] The [illegible] [illegible] the wall which [illegible] [illegible] in this country. Every [illegible] small painter would have to [illegible] till the place [illegible] that only the best artists would survive [illegible] competition. People had said the same thing about photography and the portrait painter, but when the chromo came on the scene no one seemed to remember that photographs had only increased the demand for and facilitated the production of portraits. The chromo has had its run. It has reached the remotest ranch in the savagest wild-cat civilization, and the germ there started will sooner or later develop into something better and higher in taste, for the love of art is contagious and of rapid growth. There is no such thing as flooding a picture market. Every dealer knows that the more he sells, the more he can sell. Apart, then, from all considerations of the development of public taste, of the high educational value of artistic productions, of our duties to ourselves and to posterity, all artists should, for their own progress and profit, welcome the introduction of Mr. Belmont's bill as a sign of the dawn of a new era in American art, when we may hold our place in the conclave of artistic people, modest though our representation may be, with a perfect faith that out of these small beginnings shall come noble and monumental results.

F. D. MILLET.

THE LIEDERKRANZ BALL.

What do we of New York not owe to the Germans, not the Germans of the father land, but the Germans "in our midst," or at least upon our east side. Beethoven would have composed and lager-beer been brewed if "the recoil of the revolutionary wave of 1848" had not flung upon our shores thousands, increasing later into tens and hundreds of thousands, of these excellent persons. But for the general diffusion both of the excitement of Beethoven and the mild stupefaction of the beverage which has so largely supplanted the more torrid and potent spirits which we formerly used to excess, we are clearly indebted to the German immigration.

It is a curious study for an idle social philosopher what New York—or, for that matter, any other American city of the North—would now be if it had proceeded solely along the lines of its earlier development, and if the German contingent had remained as inappreciable as, for example, the French element now is in its population. Our music, of the primitive leanness of which Mr. Richard Grant White has given a vivid picture in some recent magazine papers, and the leanness of which not even his amiable partialities as a praiser of time past can disguise, would have been virtually non-existent, for the native fiddler is much without honor and mostly void of skill, and the gospel of relaxation which Mr. Herbert Spencer inculcated after dinner would not have been far more persuasively preached by Teutonic example in gardens by the water side.

Perhaps the most enviable point about the German, to the Anglo-Saxon mind, is that he is merry and not ashamed. The average Englishman or the average American still takes his pleasure sadly, as Froissart asserted of his remote progenitor. He needs an excuse for enjoying himself, and pretends to find it in some hygienic or moral mission. He cuts capers to strengthen his tibial muscles, or to show that he is not above innocent mirth. Advanced hypocrites even pretend that they go fishing on account of the fish. No man will admit that he is enjoying himself because he likes it and without reserve.

It follows—and this is the great truth we have been leading up to—that the Anglo-Saxon can not give a public ball. His private entertainments of that nature are of a majestic and processional character to the adult participants; and as for a respectable and solvent person of mature years permitting himself to be stampeded into wild whirlings upon the floor of a public ball-room, with his countenance divested of what Thackeray describes, in his countryman at a ball, as "its usual English expression of intense gloom and subdued agony," but glistening with happiness and perspiration—the proposition is simply unspeakable. He abandons balls where people go to enjoy themselves either to children or to ruffians and rioters.

Now the German, it need scarcely be said, is superior to all this nonsense, and has given his name to a cotillion through which he prances with unaffected delight, but which is performed by persons of other nations as a ceremonial observance. And the only public balls given in New York that are at once worth going to, and that may be safely gone to, are those given by the German singing societies.

Of these societies the Liederkranz (the Garland of Songs, as the excellent sentimentalists who compose it call themselves) is the oldest and the most important, dating back almost to the beginning of the German invasion, for this of 1883 is its thirtieth annual ball, and in 1853 the Germans of New York were but a feeble folk. The Liederkranz has grown and prospered, having had for many years a club-house in Fourth Street, which it abandoned a few months ago for a new house and a more fashionable situation up town. Among its fifteen hundred members are many of the best and most solid of our German citizens, who know quite as well how to work as how to play. It has periodical club concerts, which are much prized by those who are so fortunate as to be bidden to them; but its only really public appearance during the year is at the Carnival masquerade, which this year was given at the Academy of Music on Monday, February 5.

The procession of the society is the spectacular feature of the ball, and this got under way from the adjoining supper-room at half past ten. The [illegible] and the [illegible] of the members and the [illegible] of their costumes were taxed in the [illegible] of every member to startle both his [illegible] and the natives, who in great number [illegible] from the boxes above the flow of the iridescent [illegible] upon the floor of the Academy. The various committees which had charge of the arrangements were uniformed in fancy dresses: the masquerade committee in the court dress of Louis XVI., with the ladies of the committee in corresponding costumes; the door committee in the dress of hunters from "the Nachtlager of Granada"; the floor committee in costumes of Louis XVI. again, but in four recognizable colors. Prince Carnival was, as he always is, a particularly stunning figure. Of course there was the usual miscellany of stereotyped masquerade characters, serious and comic; but there were also startling innovators, as a "Bacchante" and a "Fire Queen," and two sisters as Summer and Spring, in whom the most jaded frequenters of masquerades were compelled to [illegible]knowledge novelties. All Liederkranz balls are brilliant, but the [illegible] to [illegible]tled that this Liederkranz ball exceeded [illegible] others in brilliancy. There were eight thousand persons present at it, and an unusually large proportion of them in fancy dress. The view of the floor from the galleries, in its unrepresentable evolutions of glancing light and shifting color, was worth going a long way to see.

After the parade of the society had been dismissed, the floor was opened to the dancers, and we may emphasize for the occasion one of the most familiar and honored of the observations of Jenkins, that "the festivities were prolonged to a late hour."

COLORADO SNOW SLIDES.

As the hardy miners and the scarcely less adventurous farmers penetrate the recesses of the vast ranges of mountains grouped under the general name of the Rocky Mountains, they are not infrequently exposed to dangers which are familiar in the song and story of the dwellers in the Alps, but which have been comparatively unknown in our country. Recent despatches from Denver, the thriving chief city of Colorado, recount such an experience. West of the [illegible] Range, which rises abrupt and frowning above the base town, lies the Saguache Range, upon the slope of which the two forks of the Gunnison River have their source, and from which they flow in broad curves west and south to form, in passing, the Grand River. In these mountains are situated some of the richest of the mines of Colorado, while in the "parks" both east and west the fertile soil has attracted a considerable agricultural population. The Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, whose course is marked by as many ups and downs and sharp changes and dangerous turns as that of the stock of the company in Wall Street, approaches this region from the west, and sweeps with a varied curve along the base of the hills to the neighborhood of Ruby Peak. The mountain, some five thousand feet in height from base to summit, lies between Irwin on the southwest and Gothic on the northeast. Upon its sides are located the works of the Ruby Chief, Howard, Ericsson, Oakes, and Durango mines, with others.

On the morning of Tuesday, January 23, about an hour after midnight, a "snow-slide," as the homely Western phrase terms an avalanche, started from the summit. The distance to the foot of the mountain is nearly a mile. The masses of snow, gathering force as they went, adding to their weight and velocity with every instant, and gathering in their embrace trees, rocks, and earth, swept with them all the shaft-houses and machinery of the mines, and buried them at the bottom of the gulch. The inmates of the buildings, eight in number, were carried down with the slide. In the early morning a party from the neighboring town was organized to rescue them, and after laborious digging, all were found. One, however, was dying, and two others were [illegible]ly wounded.

The danger ought not to have been unforeseen, for on the previous Saturday one Mr. [illegible], superintendent of the Paradise Mine, had undertaken to cross the same mountain near Gothic, had been overtaken by an avalanche, and borne to the bottom of the neighboring gulch. So great was the mass of that slide that the body of the wretched man could not be recovered. The depth of snow beneath which he is buried is believed to be at least one hundred feet, and his lifeless form must be left until the return of spring unlocks his temporary tomb. And on the morning after the disaster at Irwin the town of Gothic was startled by a shock like that of an earthquake, the whole town trembling as a vast land-slide plunged past it.

The line of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad is peculiarly subject to this kind of accident. Something more than two years ago, in November, 1880, the company was pushing with great energy its Malcomo extension. A band of stalwart workmen were engaged in clearing the roadway across a small circle of level land at the foot of a mountain towering above them nearly three thousand feet. A construction train with a still larger party had just rolled away from the place. One of the laborers, as he cast a shovelful of dirt across the temporary track, noticed a quivering of the branches of some stunted pine-trees upon the mountain-side. Glancing up to learn its cause, he saw the whole mountain-side near the top in motion, though no sound had reached his ear. But his shout of terror, as he dropped his shovel to run, was mingled with a sullen roar that paralyzed his startled companions. Before they could follow him the snow-slide was upon them. It dashed the embankment into a cloud of dust, like the spray on the breaking crest of a great wave, and in the rushing mass of earth and snow the iron rails were torn from their places and twisted as broken like threads. Hearing the terrible crash, the band of men upon the construction train turned only to see the spot on which they had just left their companions piled high with a shapeless bank reaching far across the valley in the bosom of the pass. They hurried to the rescue, and a hundred pairs of arms were soon digging with desperate energy at the [illegible]. Curiously enough, ten half the number of the buried men were extricated with only slight injuries. The remainder were all more or less severely wounded, chiefly by the fragments of iron from the track. One man was killed, and several were fatally hurt.

The most dangerous of these snow-slides occur in the latter part of the winter, when the sun climbs higher in the heavens, and pours its warmer rays upon the surface of the lofty hills. The snow has a peculiar capacity for the [illegible] of the sun's heat, and [illegible] the [illegible] this influence during the [illegible] and [illegible] with a [illegible] is frequently [illegible] ally [illegible] portion [illegible] it supported [illegible] the [illegible] passed [illegible] barrier [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] picturesque [illegible] swallowing everything in its [illegible]

A·VALENTINE·TO·PHILLIS

Sweet poets oft have ſung in rhyme,
How ſmall birds mate about this time,
Of good Saint Valentine;
When now and then a day doth bring,
A throbbing promiſe of the ſpring,
Sweet gentle Phillis mine.

So may thy heart quick fluttering beat,
With tremours at my coming, ſweet,
Who heart and ſoul am thine;
As flutters the bird and ſweetly ſcars,
When her ſwift winged love ſhe hears,
This day of Valentine.

For 'tis a ſweet old legend ſays,
The maid that walks abroad these days
Of Biſhop Valentine;
The youth that firſt her eyes do greet
Shall be her love, ſo look, my ſweet,
That I may ſo be thine.

A SNOW-SLIDE IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.—Drawn by Charles Graham.—[See Page 108.]

AN OLD MAID'S VALENTINE.

She stood before a cabinet
That kept the faint and curious scent
Of all the spicy winds that blow
Across the Asian continent.
'Twas richly carved, and barred with gold;
And from its innermost recess
She took a paper, blurred and old,
And just one silky auburn tress.

She put it to her trembling lips;
She stirred it with her loving sighs:
The tenderness of a long life
Flushed in her feeble, fading eyes.
"I do not need to read," she said;
"I know the words: 'O Mary mine,
Fix soul or woe, for life or death,
You are my own sweet Valentine.'

"'Tis fifty years ago to-day
(O love, O love, that thou shouldst die!):
The hour that brought my valentine
Received, alas! thy latest sigh.
And I sat singing like a bird,
So proud, so joyful, to be thine—
'For weal or woe, for life or death.'
And still thou art my Valentine.

"No other love has filled the place,
No other voice has whispered, 'Mine';
Through all these long and lonely years
I have been true, dear Valentine.
I had no fear of growing old,
I calmly watched my beauty fade;
I heeded not the thoughtless scorn
Of those who pitied the 'old maid.'

"I am an old, so weak, so frail,
The waiting must be nearly o'er.
O darling, do not thou forget
To meet me first on yonder shore.
Patted he lifts yours, and yet
I know that thou art only mine;
I touch thee through this auburn tress;
I hear thee through this valentine."

APPROACHING THE TRUTH.

CHAPTER XIV.

TAN AICH WAMAN.

The illness of Miss Brake had disturbed at last the serenity of Farm Forlorn. It was the beginning of the end of peace at Skegs Shore. It was that for which everybody had been waiting; for there had been no belief in the false calmness of preceding days.

This was the first shock—a test trial, as it were, as to the strength of mind and purpose, the strength of heart and power of sympathy, to be evolved from the illness of Hester Brake, a singular woman, who had come as a guest to the big barn, and whom no one understood, and few had had fair words for.

Nevertheless Miss Brake's illness did not leave her without friends, on the contrary, brought friends round her, and rendered her an object of interest. And when the doctors whom John Woodhatch had summoned to his house shook their wise heads together in consultation, and said it was a bad case—an extremely critical case—the interest grew keener, and more than one face, looking sadly toward the end, took deeper shadows to it when it was prophesied there was but little hope on earth for Hester Brake.

"One night almost wonder what she was born for," said John Woodhatch, musingly, on the fifth day of her illness, "on unhappy a life from childhood to the end as it has been. A bad father, a hard struggle to exist, the victim of desertion, poverty, ill health, and terrible misfortune, what has existence been worth on this poor little woman, Alec?"

"I'm thinking it would have been a deal worse without ye, John," answered the parson, whom he was addressing—"if ye had not stood her friend through thick and thin, in a true Woodhatch fashion."

"Do you blame me?"

"No. It has cost ye a deal of money, but ye have never cared much which way ye pitched it, having plenty of it," implied his friend.

"Why should I save money?"

"Are ye so ingenuicked and reckless that ye think a rainy day won't come to ye as well as to other folk?" asked Mr Larcom.

"Ah, yes, it may," replied John Woodhatch; "and I will meet it as well as some people, and better than a good many."

"Which sounds a leetle conceited, John," said the parson, dryly.

"I am conscious."

"Yes, it's your failing at times," was the remark, "although ye are not as bad as ye were."

"I have had so much of the conceit taken out of me," John Woodhatch remarked.

"Through not listening to sarber, sensible advice, I expect."

"Proffered gratuitously by Parson Larcom, too," answered John, with a little laugh. "Oh yes, I am often in the wrong. I don't see very far ahead, as I once thought I did, in my foolish [illegible]. But then who does see far? Who [illegible] in any way as regards that point [illegible] upon?" inquired Mr Larcom, and in a somewhat lower and more earnest tone, "and who is slipping slowly out of the world under your inexpressible roof?"

"What do you mean?"

"There has been paid to her account now a matter of twenty thousand pounds, I reckon; the same amount as Morice will have when she comes of age, after deducting the necessary expenses," said Mr Larcom. "The money has reached England, and she's a rich woman already."

"If she had only had her means a couple of years ago!" said John; "it's but little use to her now."

"It's not on her mind at all, I'm thinking. She doesn't seem to be devastated about it in her ravings."

"How do you know?" asked his host.

"I put the question to Lucy, who is knocking herself up with looking after the poor soul," he replied; "and she says Hester does not seem troubled about her wealth in any way. It's the old uselessness of the murder over and over again; or else it's yourself, who are keeping away from her, and will not go to see her in the last, fret as she may for ye."

"Poor Hester! I have seen her every day, but she does not know me," remarked Woodhatch.

"She took ye yesterday for young Morris's murderer, one of the maids tells me, and nearly screamed the house down."

"We have all been Morris's murderers in our time," responded the farmer, calmly, "even you, Alec Larcom, have not escaped suspicion."

"Why should I?" replied the parson, shrugging his shoulders. "I'm a busy man, and I ought have thought the worst of young Morris, as many other people did, Skegs Shore way. And I'm not at all certain," he added, lowering his voice, "that Hester Brake may not think as just the same, and to my serious prejudice, and Lucy's."

"In what way?"

"There's a fortune in leaves, John," said the parson; "and the doctors think she may recover her senses when the fever has worn itself out, and her along with it. And though I'm not a mercenary man—the Lord forgive me if I ever was!—it's not precisely natural to set money carelessly on one side."

"I don't quite make you out, Alec," said John Woodhatch. "When you were a hard-working honest missionary abroad, and saved me to good a needs and good example, you never spoke of money, never thought of it."

Parson Larcom looked down fire an instant, abashed by the reproof.

"It was no use speaking or thinking of it, John," he answered, "when it was sheer wasting for a crust of bread. And though I'm not mercenary, I'm a daughter and a granddaughter to think of a great deal, and of myself just a leetle. Ye can't say I ever deespised riches."

"No."

"And I certainly have been thinking that if the Lord pleases to take Hester Brake, our leetle Justice would stand in her at law to her properties, if she died without a will, which she will not."

"What makes you think that?"

"She is fat too careful a woman," he answered, "too horribly business-like altogether; and six months ago she would have been afraid of the money coming to my family. And, knowing money was on its way to her, she would have made a will. I'm so certain as I'm standing here of that."

"You are quite right. She has."

"Oh! ye know, then, John—ye know?" was the eager inquiry of the minister.

"Her last will and testament she completed a week no two ago," said Woodhatch, "and gave to me to mind. It is locked in that safe yonder, where I had hoped it might rest for many years, whilst peace of mind made Hester Brake a different woman."

"It is peace of mind which passeth all understanding," said the parson, almost mechanically, and as if in duty bound to improve the occasion, "but it cometh not as all men or women in this grievous world. And ye are executor to the will, I suppose—probably sole legatee, as ye want for nothing, and won't know what to do with a fresh fortune."

"I don't think I am," was the reply. "I hope not. But I don't know anything about the disposal of her money; I have not thought of it."

"Ye should ask her presently—or some one else should," suggested Mr Larcom.

"Ah!"

"I've no objection myself, for that matter, to ask her whether at the last, like this, a sense of justice to us all may not have come to her. It will come in time too."

"We will wait for that time, Alec—which is God's, not ours," John Woodhatch answered, almost sternly.

"Amen—amen to that," cried Alec Larcom in return. "That is what I mean, of course. For pure creatures may pass away without a scrap of common-sense to brighten her at the last."

"It is more likely than not."

One would have thought so later in that day—which was known at John Woodhatch's farm as "Miss Brake's worst day"—when her high pitch of voice welled from the closed room as the comforters without, telling the sad story of disordered fancies and terrible conjectures born of a confused and half-real past. The next day she was calmer, if weaker; the following day calmer still, and with a steadier look in her dark eyes, as if wandering were she had been of late days, and what had happened to her to leave her so strange or thus a little child.

On that second day she spoke in her old manner, but in a voice to which one stooped to catch the faintly whispered words. And it was Kitty, pale and worn and grief-stricken at the bedside, to whom she said, "Where are they all?"

"They are down-stairs, most of them," was the reply. "Is there any one whom you would like to see?"

"Not yet."

Hester Brake did not speak again for a long while, she dozed throughout the morning, waking now and then by fitful starts, and regarding Kitty with the old, far-away look, which her watcher had noticed all that day, until the eyes closed and she slept fitfully.

Before the sun was very low in the heavens, she said, softly, to Kitty, "How long have I been like this?"

"A week to-day."

"So long! Have you been here all the time?"

"Lucy and I have been nursing you between us. And once Mrs Chadderton."

"Mrs Chadderton! You should not have let her come into the room," she whispered.

"She has been very kind to you; and very anxious," said Kitty, "as we all have been."

"She must not come again. I do not like her," was the whisper back, "I can not trust her."

Hester Brake was exhausted with these few words, and did not speak again until the sun was going down, all crimson, in the far-away west, and there was a glow as of fire on patient and nurse.

"Have I given you much trouble, Kitty?" she asked, suddenly, and to a voice that had gathered to itself a little extra strength from long repose.

"No, no."

"I have been delirious?"

"Yes," confessed Kitty, "a little."

"What did I say?"

"I can not remember—I don't think it was possible to understand you, madam."

"Try and think what I said," urged the sick woman.

"I could not follow you. It—it was only like talking in your sleep. That was all."

"You must have got very tired of me, Kitty."

"No, Miss Brake."

"Why, you were tired of me when I was well and strong," she added, her old jealousy predominant even in this hour. "I was your enemy, who had done you a great wrong which you could not forgive."

"Pray don't think so. What you have done has always been for the best," said Kitty, "and it was so well—I dare say it was right—that I should know [illegible] did not care for me. I was a little sad, mistress, but I bore you no ill will, God knows."

"God knows too much for us poor women," was the strange reply, "but as you have learned to taste me with the rest of them down stairs, I am very glad. I should not like you to turn against me now."

Kitty bowed her head lower to hide the tears near from the gaze of the woman lying there, and a long silence followed this again. When Hester Brake would have spoken, Kitty said, quickly, "Hush! please, dear mistress. You must not talk so much. I have done wrong already in listening to you."

"I wonder what time I have got! Remind me," she added, "to ask the—doctor that."

She did not need reminding of the question, and Kitty would not have omitted her had she forgotten it. When the doctor was at her bedside, and congratulating her in his false, cheery tones on her better condition that day, she met, almost with her old sharpness evident,

"How long have I to live?"

"My dear madam—that is really—it is surely—I can not say at all," he stammered forth.

"I have much to arrange," she said, calmly, "and to deceive me would be a crime on your part."

"Madam, it is not in my power to tell you how long you may be spared," replied the doctor. "I can only urge you to keep calm, and to assure you that any excitement is most dangerous."

"I am quite calm."

"Yes."

"And keeping calm as this, I may live—how long?"

"I have said I can not say."

"I cannot likely to recover?" she asked, quickly. "There is no hope for me, you consider?"

"I am sorry to say there is no hope," replied the doctor, softly; "but there is no immediate cause for apprehension."

"Shall I be alive this time to-morrow?"

"You may live some days—with care."

"I will be very careful," was the reply.

When the doctor had withdrawn, and Lucy Brake had spoken in to take her post as nurse, and allow Kitty to withdraw, the invalid looked at the new comer with grave interest, and even smiled faintly as she stooped and kissed her.

"You have forgiven me, Lucy, then?" she asked.

"All that I have to forgive—yes, long ago," answered the young widow.

"I wanted the truth of it all, and you to know the truth," she murmured, "nothing more."

"You see, but we will not speak of it again," said Lucy.

"Not yet. Presently."

"Presently."

"I shall be more to say soon, and I shall be very strong to say it," remarked Hester Brake, with an amazing confidence, not warranted by this feeble life flickering out to its close.

CHAPTER XV

PREPARING FOR THE FUTURE.

Parson Larcom, disturbed in his mind by thoughts of money matters, had his wish next day—the wish that lay nearest to his heart just then. Good man as he was in many respects, an earnest, red-hot Methodist, who meant what he said, and acted up to many ways to his own teaching, there was a keen consciousness of the value of money in his eyes, born of much early privation, and what more worldly people would have called a long run of ill luck. His life had been a struggle—would have been a harder struggle still without John Woodhatch to befriend him in the old cruel days; and it was not in his nature—scarcely in human nature—to see money to which by right his family was entitled drifting away from him, as he was sure it was drifting away, without any power of his to stop it.

He had been poor all his life, and there should have come riches to Lucy and Mercy—he was scarcely thinking of himself, he considered—and Hester Brake was doing them all an injustice by allowing her will to remain as it was, in John Woodhatch's safe, bequeathing twenty thousand pounds away from those who by law were most entitled to it. The first twenty thousand could not be touched till Mercy was of age—although the interest, it had been decreed, should go to her support and education—and he was getting an old man. Miss Brake would think of that—a woman without friends too—presently. Justice, as a rule, comes very close to man's heart when the great waves of eternity roll on to the sands whereon the poor mortal is waiting.

It was Mrs Chadderton who came to him with what he thought good news.

"Miss Brake wishes to see you directly, sir," she announced.

"To see me?" he exclaimed, leaping to his feet.

"Yes, sir."

"Is she—does she appear very anxious about seeing me, Mrs Chadderton?" he asked, full of his one idea of the motive for the interview.

"I can not say," was the sullen answer, "I am not allowed to go into the room."

"Indeed! How's that?"

"I am not good enough, or not to be trusted," was the response.

"That's sheer nonsense, Mrs Chadderton," remarked Mr Larcom; "every one here knows to be honest and trustworthy."

"As if I were her enemy—as if I did not love her more than my own life; and would give mine—died, how willingly!—to save hers for a little while!" she cried, with one passionate and sudden outburst, which took away a great deal of the breath of Parson Larcom.

"Do we know her, then, better than the rest of us?" Have ye in old days, Ann Chadderton, ever met her, been indebted to her, seen—"

"Nothing," was the reply, as she turned aside and went rapidly from him.

Mr Larcom did not reflect very long upon this outbreak for outburst of grief or indignation from the woman, generally so stolid, who acted as housekeeper at Farm Forlorn, under other circumstances her demeanor would have more quickly interested him. Now was the great, grand opportunity of his life, and Hester Brake had, of her own free-will, expressed an anxious wish to see him. The conviction of having wronged him and Lucy and Lucy's child had come quickly home to her, it appeared, and here was the hour of restitution. On the stairs toward her room he paused and thought a moment.

"What will John Woodhatch say to this, I wonder?" he said to himself, as if half afraid of his friend, or of his opinion of him. And if thus hard, stern Methodist had loved any of his kind, it was the master of Farm Forlorn, and valued any man's opinion, it was the opinion which John Woodhatch might always have of him.

"Wa'al," he added, as he proceeded on his way, "he will think the best of everybody always. It's his failing, but he will, post John. And," he added, immediately again, "I am in the right completely, which way he looks upon it. There can not be much doubt of that."

When he passed into the room he had not even a doubt to disturb him, and it was quite in a business-like way that he walked to the bedside and looked down upon the thin white face of the woman lying there.

"And how do we find yourself this morning, Hester?" he inquired.

"More composed, Mr Larcom. Perhaps even a little stronger," she replied, "or I should not have sent for you."

"It's as well to see all friends when we can, and arrange all things that may be necessary with them," said the parson.

"Yes, I think so."

Mr Larcom sat down by the bedside, and took his pocket-bible from his coat. The eyes of Miss Brake wandered toward it, and she said, faintly:

"Not now, please. Presently the words of promise may be of help to one more sinner here, and—I shall be glad to hear them. But," she said again, "not now."

"I thought a few appropriate verses would not be out of place. But I will not press the question," said Mr Larcom; "and as it may be necessary of an important nature, perhaps Mercy Vanch will not mind leaving us awhile?"

Kitty had been standing on the other side of the bed, and she looked to her mistress for instructions.

"You need not leave us," said Hester, "there is no great secret in this. You know what I am likely to say to Lucy's father."

"Yes, I think so," answered Kate; "how—"

"But remain," was Miss Brake's mandate.

Kitty bowed her head, but by way of compromise walked to the window of the room, sat down before it, and looked out upon the quiet landscape. Mr Larcom did not feel so sure as he had done upon the stairs that the great question as to the disposal of her worldly goods was in any way affecting the mind of Hester Brake.

"I wish to speak to you of Lucy," she commenced.

"Oh yes!" said Mr Larcom, brightening again, "to be sure. She is your sister-in-law—I am glad ye think of her in kindness now."

"She has been very kind to me," remarked Miss Brake. "Almost as kind as Kitty there, and I begin—perhaps for the first time in my life—to value the warmth of heart she has, and to see for myself her natural earnestness."

"She's a good girl," said Mr Larcom, "and for one so young has passed through many trials. Which have improved her, too," he added, "as trials will do very often."

"There is much talk of you both going abroad—even of living abroad—is there not?" asked Hester.

"Wa'al, yes," he replied. "It may be necessary for the property which our little Morice will inherit a long day hence—and Slego Shore is very dull."

"To you?"

"To Lucy. She requires change," he said—"here are some tarnished associations, and we have never had the means to get away from them."

"They are in the distance," she replied, "and you have borne the worst of them like me, and I—I don't like John Woodhatch to lose all his friends at once."

"I was not exactly thinking of friend John."

"Ah! but you must. He has hard trials to come, and will want true friends about him, and new hopes to replace the old which have been torn up by the roots. And you," she continued, "are a minister of God's word, his oldest friend, and indebted to him, as we all have been. Under no circumstances that I can see are you privileged to desert him."

"Gard bless me, Hester!" exclaimed Mr Larcom, "I'm not likely to desert him. I are always his friend, as he is mine. But he don't like patronage, and he is proud of his own way."

"And he loves your daughter Lucy," she added, quietly.

"He did—once, at any rate."

"He does now."

"He never says so."

"Because he is the proud man of whom you have just spoken," she said, "and will not add to Lucy's anxiety by speaking of his love for her ever any more, unless—"

"Unless?"

"Unless a change occur in her, and she begin to see where her affection should naturally turn. She has thought too long of my brother Morris."

"That's true enough," asserted Mr Larcom, "but I'm fancying we need not talk of this."

"It is all I have to say to you," remarked Hester.

"Ah, indeed," was the almost rueful comment here.

"And it is upon my mind," she continued, "it is before me always, that she is going away from him—she who only can make his life light, in return for all these dreary, desolate days which he has had. Mr Larcom," she added, with more earnestness, "you do not know John Woodhatch yet, the nobleness there is in his repentance, the earnest task which he has set himself, the good that lies like gold always at his heart."

"Yes, yes," asserted Mr Larcom; "but let us be more calm about this."

The Methodist was puzzled. He did not understand this praise and glory of John Woodhatch, or see clearly the motive for it all. Why should Hester Brake be so anxious concerning John's future, and Lucy's love for him? Was it not an old story which was ended?—a sealed book, the leaves of which could never rustle more?

"She will learn to love him, if you will help me now," she continued, eagerly. "She is your daughter; you will have influence over her; she will see it is best."

He was not quite certain it was best himself. The world had changed with him and Lucy, and John Woodhatch was five years older than when he had thought it would be wise and well for Lucy to accept him. Lucy would never marry, probably; but if she did, with her good looks, and in her different sphere abroad, she might do better for herself in all respects. He was not quite certain about John Woodhatch now as a son-in-law; John was a friend very dear to him—how dear he did not know yet—but Alec Larcom was a calculating man, and, after all, there was the daughter Lucy to consider first.

"We must leave it to time," he replied. "I don't see there is anything to be done at present."

"There is a good deal to be prepared for."

"Oh! is that it?" he asked, doubtfully.

"Haven't I said so already?" she demanded, peevishly. "You heard me say there were fresh troubles coming to him."

"How can ye know that, Hester?"

"I must tell him all the trouble before I die. That is my last duty," she replied.

"What have ye been keeping back from him—and me?" he inquired.

"I will tell him everything, and leave him to act as he thinks best. And the best," she cried, "is only desolation."

Mr Larcom gave a vigorous twitch to his right ear. Was she delirious? Was she wandering again in that poor weak head of hers?

"Man is born unto trouble," he remarked, sententiously; "and John Woodhatch will bear all that is meant for him as well as most folk—better than a good many."

"With Lucy—yes," answered Hester. "And though she is not fit for him, does not understand him, has never cared for him, still he has set his heart on her, and he must have her, Mr Larcom."

Mr Larcom was surprised at this peremptory assertion, but he would not utter anything by way of opposition.

"We must leave it to Lucy. I have nothing to say myself," he said.

"She will not look back at Morris now as a saint struck early from her life, but as a poor vain mortal, who was not, even in the first months of his marriage, an honest, faithful husband. If Morris had lived," she said, "hers would have been an unhappy and distrustful life to the end. He was very weak."

"It is not considered well of us, Hester, to speak ill of the dead," he said, reprovingly.

"I loved him very much," she answered. "With all his faults he was very dear to me; but it was right she should know the truth when the false picture of what he really was kept her life in darkness. And I told the miserable truth to her."

"And I don't suppose she was excessively obliged to ye, Hester," he said, dryly.

"She will guess the reason presently. And with your help, Mr Larcom," she added, "Lucy will be a happier woman, and that help you will promise a poor dying friend."

"I wonder ye did not tackle Lucy instead of me," he said, with a half groan of discontent. "All this kind of business is entirely out of my line."

"Lucy would turn against me even at the last. She is not always just."

"She's a woman," added Mr Larcom, "and a leetle variable."

"And you promise me?" she urged again.

"To do always my best for the happiness of John Woodhatch," said the minister, more earnestly, "I give you Alec Larcom's solemn word, I will. And I would have done so always, Hester, without such a poor promise as ye ask of me."

"Yes—you ought," she continued, with a sigh, "but you would not have known what was best for him—he would have hidden it away from you and Lucy—had I not told you for myself."

"Ye—es. Thankee, child," he muttered. "And are ye sure there's nothing more to tell me—to ask me?"

"Nothing."

"No worldly affairs to ask my advice upon—now ye are a rich lady?" he blurted out at last.

"All that is settled, thank Heaven! My worldly affairs can not trouble me again," she murmured.

"Then I need not keep ye talking any longer, Hester?" he said, rising.

"No," she responded. "I have wearied you too much already. But I wanted your word of him or to me—I felt it would strengthen me at the last. And," she added, "as you keep your word, so will God remember you, old friend."

He bowed his gray head at this, and looked hard at her, as if suspecting she suspected him, or had another motive for so grave an exordium at the last. Then he leaned over her, kissed her forehead as if in farewell of her, and went from the room. When he had gone, Kitty hastened to her side.

"Oh! my dear mistress, you have talked too much—you have excited yourself beyond your strength, I am sure."

"No, I am better already," she answered, with a strange smile. "I am getting quite strong."

"I wish you were."

"I have only one more task before me—and that will not be to-day," she added, as Kitty glanced nervously toward her, "and He will give me strength for it, I am sure."

"Will you not try and rest a little?"

"I am a little weary, perhaps. What time is it?"

"Nearly twelve o'clock."

"Yes, I will rest."

She closed her eyes, and went off immediately into a sound slumber—so deep a slumber that the doctor came into the room without disturbing her, and seeing how calm and regular her sleep was, went away without arousing her, and with a promise to return at a later hour. The day stole on; the afternoon sun shone into the room, upon the pattern of the wall, the pictures there, the ceiling overhead, and then flickered away along the line of house roof without, and died away for good. Kitty was replaced by Lucy, and Lucy, on some errand of her father's, was called away after an hour's watchful service, and when Hester Brake awoke it was in the twilight of the day, and with the room full of shadow.

"Kitty?" she said, softly; and Kitty not replying to her, she called out, in a stronger tone, "Lucy, is that you?"

A figure rose from a chair behind the curtains, and a voice said, very humbly, and with much tremor in it, "No, madam; it is I."

"And you are—"

"Ann Chadderton," said the housekeeper, as she came slowly round the bed and took her place by the side of the sick woman.

"What are you doing here?" demanded Hester Brake. "Have I not given orders days ago you should not be admitted to this room? Are you not always a terror to me—a living horror I can not bear to meet?"

"Young Mrs Brake was called away a moment since. She did not wish you to be left. I was at hand," exclaimed Mrs. Chadderton, unmoved by Hester Brake's strong condemnation of her; "and Mrs. Lucy will not be very long."

"Where is Kitty?"

"Asleep. I would not have her disturbed by any one just now," was the deep response; "it is the only rest which she may get to-night."

"Poor Kitty! Yes. But," she said, in a tone less firm, "you must not stop with me. I would rather be here alone until Lucy returns. Leave me, I beg of you."

"I will go," said the housekeeper. "Heaven forbid I should in any way distress you! But will you tell me why you hate me, or what harm, in any way, at any time of my life, I have done to you? I may have done you harm some years ago, when I was bad; but, oh! I don't remember it? Yours is not a face belonging to bad times."

"When you were bad!" said Hester Brake, with bitter irony.

"Yes, Miss Brake, for you know what I was, I dare say."

"I am content in knowing what you are. Pray go. And if you have any wish to do me service—"

"As I have?" came the quick interruption, "and if it is only in my power to do it."

"Then keep away forever after this—from me," murmured Hester. "Don't let me see you in this life again. I shall not trouble you long—and you stand before me like a spectre which I can not face."

"Why?—please tell me why, Miss Brake?" she asked again. "If you only would do that."

"John Woodhatch will tell you soon enough."

"Very well."

Mrs. Chadderton walked away from the bedside with her gaze directed toward the carpet. As she passed round behind the curtains at the bed's foot, and which were drawn closely and hid her from the sick woman, she came to a full stop, and Hester Brake waited in vain for the clicking of the door lock that should tell of the housekeeper's departure. It was a painful suspense, which might have tried the nerves of one in full health and vigor, and suspectful of the person unseen in the background, but Hester Brake lay very still, and with her dark eyes watchful and wondering, but hardly betraying any fear of what might follow this.

Her faintly beating heart stirred more, perhaps, as Mrs. Chadderton's slight figure once again appeared, and this time advancing toward her, not moving away as Hester had adjured her, and as she had promised that she would.

Mrs Chadderton's face was very white and lined—seemed, as it were, to have taken ten years more of age upon it, and twenty years more of grief and misery, as she returned to her old place at the bedside and looked down on Hester Brake.

"I shall see you no more," she cried, "and this is the last time you and I are to meet in this world. You say so?"

"Yes. I say it—I hope it, Mrs. Chadderton; but I am very powerless."

"Your wish is law with me," replied the housekeeper.

"I wish it, then."

"Then listen to me for one moment."

THREE WORDS, AND NO MORE.

Beautiful bird, from your Southern home bringing Promise that Spring will soon wander this way,
High in the silvery willow boughs singing
  Songs to your lady-love, tell me, I pray,
  What to enchant her so sweetly you say?

For I would send my own dear one a letter
  Wreathed with a garland of choicest fine—
Blooms long ago chosen young Cupid to fetter
  On days that are sacred to St. Valentine;
  Then make, I entreat you, your magic charm mine.

"Simple the story," the bird answered, proudly,
  "That's set as a charm to the music I pour
Forth from my full heart, now softly, now loudly,
  But it never wearies, though told o'er and o'er—
  'I love you, I love you'—three words, and no more."

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Fishing with axes is a novel winter sport in the far West. The Truckee River is frozen to the bottom. "Passing over the glassy surface of the stream," says a Nevada paper, "whole schools of trout are seen firmly fixed just where the cold wave struck them. The ranchmen living along the river now go fishing with axes, and in some places chop out a dozen of the speckled beauties in a bunch."

There are indications that some pleasure party which returned from Europe not very long ago has the burden of a dishonest act weighing on its collective conscience, and that some custom-house inspector, if he is not proof against inner accusations, is carrying a like weight. The United States Treasurer received an envelope a few days ago containing ten dollars and a letter in which the anonymous writer says that the money is the estimated amount due the government on dutiable articles brought from Europe. He adds "If I could have made head or tail of the tariff, I would have paid the duty honestly at once, and not have suffered myself to be overruled by the other members of the party, and beguiled into paying the custom-house inspector instead of the United States."

A scientific writer estimates that there are already one hundred million tons of gas in the air. What the amount will be when Congress gets through with the tariff question he doesn't attempt to guess.

An Orange County milkman leaped from his milk cart and took to the woods. It was at first thought that he had hydrophobia, but it proved to be delirium tremens.

Bogus noblemen are becoming audacious. Several London hotel keepers have been swindled recently by them. American landlords could give their English brethren points for the detection of the swindlers. A bogus duke was betrayed at a hotel in this country not long ago by the fact that his boots were shockingly run down at the heels.

Citizens of this progressive republic are soon reduced to the humiliation of saying that the population of their city or town is just so many thousands, hundreds, tens, and units. The census figures are always a few years behind the count, and the proud resident can invariably add a few thousands for the estimated increase. Persons who complain of the tardiness of the official figures should consider this and rejoice.

Some nervous and over-solicitous persons have been making an outcry for fire-escapes on college dormitories. When college students abandon the practice of leaving farmers' wagons astride the ridge-poles of gymnasia, stalling stray horses in chapel belfries, and going hand over hand up lightning-rods on a freezing night to execute a scheme for muffling the college bell's tongue with congealed water, it will be time to appeal to the wealthy alumni for funds with which to erect and maintain fire-escapes.

Complaint is made in London that when an actor throws his lighted cigar on the stage he may cause a fire. The practice is also an unnecessary waste. He might present the cigar to the gentleman in the nearest proscenium box. Another safe and economical way would be to use a pipe.

A warmer wave following in the wake of a "blizzard" causes a Minneapolis paper to exclaim: "Thank goodness the upper half of the thermometer is coming into use at last!"

A correspondent at Albany styles the Monday evening sessions of the Legislature "the weekly dress parades." The galleries are thronged with ladies, and many seats on the floor are yielded up to them. "The handsomest and most polished of the members," the correspondent writes of a recent Monday night session, "buttoned up their Prince Alberts and delivered speeches on every measure that came up." As social successes these sessions are pronounced unsurpassable, but as legislative events they are deemed of little account.

The Japanese Department of Agriculture is interesting itself in oyster planting. Probably the Japanese name for the department is such that it includes mariculture, and thus the seeming incongruity does not exist.

There is a difference between a Sandwich Islands "blizzard" and one of the North American variety. The Hawaiian Gazette says: "A cold snap is reported from all parts of the island. At Wailuku, on Monday morning, the glass stood at 60°."

A resolution recently introduced in the Assembly providing for the printing of two thousand five hundred copies of a diagram of the Assembly Chamber brought out a frank announcement of his position from one of the legislators. "Last year," he said, "I voted for a similar resolution. I didn't get a diagram. This year I am heartily in favor of economy, and therefore I vote No."

"A vast ice gorge blocks the mouth of the Youghiogheny." This is retaliation in kind. The Youghiogheny now knows how it feels to have its own mouth blocked.

Preparations for a Southern Exposition on a grand scale, to begin in Louisville, Kentucky, on the 1st of next August, and to continue during a hundred days, are going on. The main building, now in course of construction, will cover about thirteen acres, and will cost some $150,000, exclusive of interior embellishments and machinery. The exposition grounds are to be near the southern end of Fourth Street, and arrangements are in progress for horse-car and steam-car communication directly with the grounds. It is promised that the exposition shall be the greatest ever held in this country, save the Centennial Exposition of 1876.

According to the account of a recent day's debate in Congress, Representative Brewer, of New Jersey, is easily astonished. The abstract of his remarks says that he "expressed his astonishment to see how little men knew about things they knew nothing about." The debate was, of course, on the tariff.

Disdaining to count by centuries, the people of New Mexico are making preparations to celebrate what they style the tertio-millennial of Santa Fe—the 333d anniversary of its settlement.

An interesting feature of the National Exposition of Railway Appliances, to be held in Chicago from May 24 to June 23 of the present year, will be the collection of relics of the earlier days of constructing and operating railways. The secretary, Mr E. H. Talbott, whose head-quarters are at the Grand Pacific Hotel, invites persons having knowledge of the existence of relics of that nature to communicate with him. The management of the exposition looks to the East for many interesting contributions to the display.

In the course of recent excavation for a tramway tunnel, designed to facilitate communication between Naples and Pozzuoli, a discovery was made in which archæologists are greatly interested. It is an under-ground way, constructed apparently for the passage of water, and it is conjectured that the conduit once served to supply water to the old Roman villas situated on the side of Posilipo hill, between Naples and Pozzuoli, and to other villas which were destroyed long ago. The conduit is arched, is high enough for a man of medium stature to walk upright in it, and wide enough to allow two men to walk abreast. Two-thirds of the inner surface is covered with plaster, and the roof was incrusted with stalactites, which, when the passage was opened, became liquefied, and ran down over the walls, making a silicate deposit. One branch of the conduit was traversed for a quarter of a mile toward the sea. The other runs deeper into the hill, and on its walls are inscriptions made with nails, and believed to indicate the villas which were supplied. The date of an inscription found between two layers of plaster is indicated by the words "Nerva Consule." There [illegible] in red letters. THE SEASON OF SNOWS AND RAINS.

The first days of February are of ill omen for the dwellers in the valleys of the smaller rivers of the United States, and particularly in those debouching upon the Ohio or the lakes, and some of those along the Mississippi. The ground is yet hard from the frosts of winter. The streams are covered with ice. The snow lies on the hill sides and in the recesses of the valleys. The first breath of the approaching spring melting the surface snow, covering the land with mist and fog, is followed by wide rains or still wider areas of "thaw." The water formed by the melting snows or precipitated from the teeming clouds flows unobserved over the hardened earth. The ice, penetrated by the warm winds and rotted by the brooding vapors, yields to the pressure of the swollen streams, breaks from the banks, floats with the hastening current, and finally, checked in the narrow or shallow passes, forms immense dams, above which the impatient floods accumulate until they burst their barriers and sweep downward, carrying destruction in their track. Each recurring spring scenes, from causes not yet clearly determined, to bring a more or less regular increase in these floods, the exceptions only killing those who are exposed to a false security, and making more victims for the added violence which is almost sure to be experienced.

The State of Ohio on one side and of West Virginia on the other side of the Ohio River are peculiarly subject to this kind of disturbance. In Ohio there are no mountains, strictly speaking, and the "divide," or "water-shed," which traverses the State in a direction a little south of west, is nowhere more than twelve hundred feet in width. But the streams which rise on these gentle slopes and flow, on the south into the Ohio and on the north into the lakes, wind their way between banks usually from one hundred to four hundred feet in height, and relatively abrupt. The soil is soft and rich, and when unbroken shrubs must are notable, but at the season of the year the river-banks are like the sides of ice-gutar canals, within which the angry streams may and do rise to considerable heights.

On the night of the 2d to the 3d of February a heavy rain-storm extended eastward from Chicago over the States of Illinois, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia, while westward snow has falling. The railways through Minnesota, already greatly impeded by previous snow-falls, were wholly blockaded, and all attempts to cross the State from east to west were abandoned for several days. Still further west the Union Pacific and Utah Northern railways were blockaded, and four days' snow in Wyoming broke off all communication. For twenty-four hours no trains arrived in Chicago, and as the storm changed to sleet, the telegraph wires broke under the icy weight, and no dispatches entered or left Chicago for nearly a day.

Toward the east the railway bridges on the lines crossing the States of Indiana and Ohio were everywhere undermined or carried away. On the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne, and Chicago twenty bridges were wholly or partially destroyed. The trains were compelled to feel their way cautiously through the fog and the darkness. One freight train was "ditched" by a "washout," and the engineer and conductor killed. The Pacific Express train, on the night of the 4th, finding itself blocked on its eastward way, near Canton, Ohio, backed up some fifty miles, was divided into two sections, and switched on to a branch road to get around the flooded district. At Orrville the first section of the train broke down a weakened bridge, and the second section plunged upon it. By a miracle the passengers escaped, with some bruises, before the two trains were wrapped in flames, and a second Ashtabula horror was avoided.

At Youngstown, on the Mahoning River, the seat of some of the largest iron mills of the country, two hundred families were driven from their homes by the flood which poured through the streets of the town. No lives were lost, though the water, six feet deep, coursed through Mahoning Avenue, the principal street. At Cleveland, Ohio, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga River, great damage was done to property, particularly to the lumber district along the banks of the river. Here some half a million dollars' worth of lumber was washed away, while the total loss is estimated at not less than two millions. Two gallant fellows who were rescuing some women and children were drowned. The Scioto, Auglaize, Maumee, and the Ohio River itself, all rose with extraordinary rapidity. At Wheeling, West Virginia, the Ohio rose thirty-one feet nine inches in a few hours, at Steubenville to thirty three feet. At Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where the Allegheny and the Youghiogheny join, the water rose to the height of twenty-six feet, carrying away several bridges, submerging railway tracks and warehouses, and driving the dwellers on the banks from their homes, or imprisoning them in the upper portions. On Herr's Island, in the Allegheny, a number of people were cut off from escape by the destruction of a bridge, and remained for thirty-six hours without communication, their houses flooded up to the second story.

At Titusville, Pennsylvania, Oil Creek was dammed by an ice gorge which formed near the water-marks above the city. The gas works were inundated, and the streets of the town were left in darkness during the nights of the 3d and 4th. A bridge across the creek, on which numbers had gathered to watch the flood, was carried away, and three young men were thrown into the flood. One was rescued in a dying condition, but the bodies of the others were not recovered. It is reported that five hundred families were compelled to abandon their houses, and the streets of the town are left by the receding waters strewn with blocks of ice and the ruins of dwellings, warehouses, and depots.

1st—The PATENT WAVING machine can't be shown to fit ANY head. 2d—They DO NOT HAVE A FRIZZLY, crimpy look as sometimes seen. 3d—For a natural wave or break appearance, and extreme WAVES as may be made. 4th—They CANNOT WEIGHT or ABRASION with dampness, but may be made deeper by moisture. 5th—They do not fade in crimping, for they don't require crimping as it is not a fact. 6th—They are only dressed with a FEW CURLS, when they are BRAIDED, and are a source of pleasure to ladies for a year or more without redressing. 7th—THE SIMPLE QUERY NEED BE ASKED (Did Mrs. Thompson, or friend to worry it out. 8th—MOST IMPORTANT. Every lady can have name and address with a TASTEFUL WAVE, on ordinary call. As specimen cards are not to be given away promiscuously, I would have to different styles of TASTEFUL WAVES, every time I call, to supply.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

Published February 20, contains a rare assortment of stories, attractions being equally divided between the girls and boys. The former will turn with eager interest to "Uncle Gabriel's Valentine," a story of school-girl life, by MISS ALICE CARY, and to Chapters XVII and XVIII of "Nan," by MRS. LILLY F. LELLIS, the experiences of that little heroine becoming more exciting and pathetic as the story draws to a close. The boys will linger regretfully over the concluding chapter of "Boy," by WAYMAN WHITE, JR., and will follow with delight the fortunes of the colonel dog "Rowser," as described by G. A. B. DEWEY.

There is a timely article on "Washington in Youth," and MRS. M. E. SANGSTER gives some pleasant information in regard to the power here in an article entitled "The Mouse." JAMES OTIS introduces his readers to a pleasant game for winter evenings, entitled "Kind's Court."

REGULATION OF PRIMARY ELECTIONS.

THERE is no reason that the attention which is justly paid to measures of political policy should prevent the consideration of improvements in political methods, and it is in this view that the interest in the legal regulation of primary elections is one of the good signs of the times. There is a bill pending in the New York Legislature which provides certain safeguards, but a more comprehensive and thorough regulation is needed to secure the end desired. There will always be ingenious and unscrupulous devices to pervert the methods of party government to personal objects, and to baffle and defeat an honest expression of the party will. These efforts rely for success upon party loyalty. The assumption is sound that a voter who, upon the whole, prefers one party to another, will submit to much in the party management that he does not approve, rather than aid the success of the opposition. The plausible argument urged for acquiescence is that every voter in a party can not expect to have everything just as he would choose, and must make concessions and a choice of evils. It is in this way that parties are perverted from their purposes, and that honest men sometimes find themselves supporting a party, not because it accomplishes what they wish, but because they doubt whether any other will do better.

As there is this constant tendency to perversion, there must be a constant corresponding purpose to counteract it, and to make party a faithful agent and elections honest expressions of the popular will. This is the great and radical reason for civil service reform, and it is also the argument for the regulation of primary elections. They are both means of preventing popular institutions from being turned against themselves, and the sound methods at which they aim are even more essential to the permanent prosperity of the country than a wise system of tariff taxation, because they involve directly the honest representation of the popular will. The reform of the civil service has begun by the passage of the reform bill, and the regulation of the primaries will effectively second that beginning. Each measure will aid the other. The first, by preventing the minor civil service from being treated as the spoils of party success, tends to destroy the motive for corruption of the primaries, and the purification of the primaries helps to lessen the hostility to a reformed service.

Regulation of the primaries means a preliminary election at which the individual preferences of the members of a party respecting candidates shall be ascertained. This would show the real disposition and condition of the party, which the general election, as now conducted, does not show. It would enable every voter to declare his preference, and to ascertain how far it was shared by others. It would secure an honest representation of the party sentiment in party conventions, which is now always doubtfully accomplished. It would further enable every voter, by showing him the actual relative strength of candidates, to throw his vote most effectively at the final and decisive election. But chiefly—and this is the most important consideration—it would baffle the plots of large and local "bosses" and "boelers," and re-awaken general active interest in politics by restoring to the citizen who can not make politics a business his legitimate share of influence in controlling them. Undoubtedly the skill of political knavery would gradually devise means of baffling the good operation of the reformed primaries. This is but natural. Knavery is always trying to outwit honesty. But that is only a reason for continued and continually greater diligence in withstanding it. The honest American people, as experience shows, may be trusted not only to keep their political system in repair, but constantly to improve it, and to smile, as they improve, at the sneers of the knavish and the feeble who hold the hope of progress to be folly and the light of common-sense to be mere moonshine.

THE GERRYMANDER.

THE Democratic majority in the New York Legislature should remember that the Gerrymander, although seductive, is a dangerous "wild fowl" to handle. The Congressional apportionment is to be made, and there is no question of the principles which should govern it. The districts should be composed of contiguous territory, and as nearly as may be of an equal number of inhabitants. The district lines presupposes local interests, but local interests can not be assumed of widely severed districts. Moreover, the fundamental purpose of any apportionment whatever is a just representation, and this purpose is defeated by the unbridled antics of the Gerrymander.

It is true that the apportionment must be made by a party majority. But must party action necessarily be devoid of patriotism, and a decent respect for the public opinion which happily makes and unmakes party success? This is a question in which the Democratic majority in the New York Legislature is deeply interested. As yet that majority has done nothing whatever to help its party at the polls, and if in the new apportionment the Gerrymander should be found sprawling over the State, the penny wise, pound fool policy of tricky men will be found to have its usual result. The solitary instance of real sagacity in the Democratic party since its downfall in 1860 was the canal reform of Mr. TILDEN in New York in 1875-6. The motives of that reform need not be now discussed. But the fact is that a Democratic Governor of New York persuaded the State and the country that he was honestly reforming a great public abuse, and the effect upon the party fortunes was significant. But a similar result will not be produced by desperate grabbing for spoils and reckless gerrymandering.

The Apportionment Bill as presented is of the kind that will be applauded in Democratic bar-rooms as "smart." Its character and purpose are shown by combining Westchester, Putnam, and Richmond counties in one Congressional district. It might as well combine Chautauqua, Rensselaer, and Suffolk. Richmond County, indeed, is an island, and the amount of its population requires it to be attached to some other county. But of course it should be attached to its nearest neighbor. This Gerrymander, however, is declared to be approved by "the party authorities," and he will give them a very disagreeable ride. If the Democrats had offered an apportionment bill which was obviously intended to secure a just representation of the people, instead of a party advantage, they might have sacrificed one or two members of Congress, but they would have gained popular respect. The Apportionment Bill may become law, but it will not help the Democratic party.

RIGHTS THAT WE ARE BOUND TO RESPECT.

THE Friends have hitherto been the only organized body which has persistently sought justice for the Indians. The general view of the Indian question has been that which is known as the military view—that they are vermin to be exterminated. We do not say that all soldiers hold this view, for we do not forget General MILES and General CROOK and others, but it is the usual military theory. For some time, however, it has been evident that a wiser and humaner treatment of the subject was demanded, and this tendency has taken form in the organization at Philadelphia of the Indian Rights Association, of which Mr. WAYNE MACVEAGH is president, Mr. GEORGE M. DALLAS vice-president, and which has the support of many other of the most eminent citizens. Its general object is to secure fair play for the Indians upon certain definite and sensible principles, and to bring to bear upon the subject the force of an intelligent and resolute public opinion.

To the formation of this opinion a little pamphlet by Mr. HENRY S. PANCOAST will greatly contribute. It is a sketch of Impressions of the Sioux Tribes in 1882, with some First Principles in the Indian Question, and it presents that question in a few incisive statements which must command attention. The author has no kind of "axe" to grind. He is an intelligent observer, a patriotic American, and a humane man, and his little pamphlet is a public service. In brief, the Indians are increasing in number, and not likely to decrease. They can not be exterminated without a barbarous crime of which the United States could not be guilty. They can not safely remain in their present anomalous relation to the rest of the population. The present policy of treating them as absolute dependents, without legal rights, leads to intolerable oppression and cruelty, and the obvious course for a self respecting nation is to assimilate them. To this the obstructions are race difference and difference of political position. These must be abolished by education and legislation. Education, individual ownership of land, and equality before the law compose, therefore, the true Indian policy.

An Indian can not now bring a suit to recover a debt or wages, and a whole tribe is punished for the offense of an individual. This might be plausibly defended if we treated them honorably as tribes. But we do not. We make treaties and break treaties to suit ourselves. There are not many Indians. The last census gives but 262 366 of them altogether, of which about 40,000 are proximately civilized. Yet our treatment of them has been a national shame, and while the general situation remains unchanged we can well forbear to taunt England with the treatment of Ireland. The Indian question, however, has not been wholly neglected. Both the GRANT and the HAYES administrations did something to improve the situation. But public opinion has been very sluggish, and has rested satisfied with the thought that the Indians were disappearing by absorption and extermination. The fallacy of this impression is evident, and the organization of the association, not upon a sentimental basis, except as justice and all the highest and wisest motives are sentiments, betokens a happier era both for the white man and the Indian.

FAIR PLAY WANTED.

THE difficulty of dealing with the tariff is the difficulty of satisfying by the same measure interests which are radically opposed. In this conflict it is very easy to sacrifice the most important interests, as is shown by the extraordinary action of the Senate toward American publishers. The Senate proposed to lay a heavy tax upon the manufacture of books in this country, and to relieve the foreign manufacture of all tax whatever. In the brief debate or colloquy upon this unjust discrimination much was said about a tax upon intelligence. But what tax upon intelligence can be more unjust and fatal than that which favors the foreign publisher at the expense of the American?

The bill as amended by the Senate admitted manufactured books free, and laid a tax of twenty-five or thirty per cent upon the material from which books are manufactured. Now the American publisher is not such an offender that he has forfeited his right to fair play. In the competition of honest trade there is no reason why he should be heavily handicapped. But this is what was accomplished by the bill as proposed, and it is one of the illustrations of the curious shortsightedness of those who do not see that a tariff must be regarded as a whole. No man can vote upon it intelligently who does not understand the relations of its various parts.

The duties upon ink, sized and unsized paper, straw, morocco, stereotype plates, and type are all maintained, and wood pulp is obliged to pay twenty per cent. The logic of all this, in any consistent or intelligent view of a tariff, is the maintenance of the duty upon the manufactured book. But the Senate was apparently unable to perceive the injustice of retaining the tax upon the materials and taking it off the product. Should this extraordinary blow at American industry be finally approved by the Senate and reach the House, we trust that it will be effectually "countered" there, and this gross injustice to a most valuable and important interest remedied.

EX GOVERNORS MORGAN AND JEWELL.

THE late ex-Governor MORGAN, whose biography has been published in all the daily papers, was long a conspicuous figure in this community. He came to the Governorship of the State in the prime of his powers, when a great national crisis was imminent, and to be Governor of New York at the beginning of the civil war was as severe a test as could be applied to any man's capacity. It is the honor of Governor MORGAN that he was equal to the extraordinary occasion, and to its overwhelming duties. He will be always remembered as one of the American worthies who were known as the War Governors, and under his administration New York maintained her old renown.

Transferred to the Senate of the United States, his large business experience, his practical ability and trained familiarity with public affairs, made him a most serviceable representative of the State and of the great city, and his sound judgment won for him the universal respect of his colleagues. One of the foremost of successful merchants, he was attentive to business until the very end of his life, and, without lingering illness, he dies amid the general regret of the community that he had faithfully served.

A younger man, of the same tastes and career, ex-Governor MARSHALL JEWELL, of Connecticut, was buried on the day that Governor MORGAN died. A cheerful, successful, prosperous citizen, merchant, and politician, Governor JEWELL also will be sincerely regretted. His unfailing good-humas, his shrewdness, intelligence, and bonhomie, made him universally popular. Like Governor Morgan, he had been chairman of the National Republican Committee, and like him he was an unswerving party man. But there could be no bitterness in his contentions, and political friend and foe will remember him with the utmost kindness.

"HOME, SWEET HOME."

After lying in a foreign grave for thirty-one years, the dust of the author of "Home, Sweet Home," is brought home at last, and the feeling with which the incident is regarded was all expressed by a poet of kindred impulse in a recent number of the Weekly. Mr. Duyckinck gives a very interesting sketch of Payne in the Cyclopædia of American Literature, taken in great part from a paper of his friend Theodore S. Fay.

Payne was born in New York in 1792, but his father went immediately afterward to Boston, where at a very early age the boy's taste and talent for literature and the theatre appeared. Returning to New York, he was a clerk in a counting-room and a student at Union College, always with the same tastes, until in his sixteenth year, in 1809, he appeared at the old Park Theatre in New York as Young Norval. He was a successful actor, and by the advice of Cooke, Payne went to London in 1813. In England and France, with varying fortune, as actor, manager, and playwright, he remained for nearly twenty years. His Brutus was brought out by Kean with great success in 1818. And when Charles Kemble became manager of Covent Garden, and applied to Payne for aid, Payne offered him a collection of MSS. for £20. The £30 was the sum asked for Clari, or, the Maid of Milan. Kemble bought them all. Payne turned Clari into an opera. Miss M. Tree, the elder sister of Ellen Tree, took the chief part, and sang, for the first time, "Home, Sweet Home." The play was enormously successful. Miss Tree made "a great hatch," and everybody made money except Payne, who lost not only the £20 which was to have been paid for copyright on the twentieth night, but he was not even complimented with a copy of his song. He wrote Charles II., another very successful play. But still fortune refused to smile, and in 1838 he came home.

Here he had various projects, but nothing prospered. He went as consul to Tunis, then returned, and vainly sought a more congenial place, finally going back to Tunis as consul, where he died and was buried in April, 1852. There his body has rested quietly, not in a "neglected spot," but in a garden of roses and carnations and heliotropes and violets. There, too, he was kindly regarded by Europeans and the native inhabitants. On the 5th of January his coffin was disinterred, and, as a letter in the Tribune states, it was carried, attended by his old Arab dragoman and a few personal friends, to the little Protestant church where the chancel window is inscribed with his name. As the coffin was brought in an Englishman at the organ softly played "Sweet Home," which an American lady sweetly sang, and then it was left alone through the night, watched by the dragoman, and in the morning it was placed upon a French steamer, a hirch sailed for Marseilles. At Marseilles it was transferred to a steamer for New York. The name of Payne will live in the heart of every generation by the pathetic tenderness of a single song.

THE DOG IN THE MANGER

A merchant of the strongest Republican sympathies, and whose views are entitled to the most careful consideration as those of a man of great commercial experience and sagacity, writes as as follows:

"Nast's well-timed illustration of the old fable recalls an incident in Mr Chase's administration which may be worth notice by our legislators.

"I once called Mr Chase's attention to the importance of changing the navigation laws, when the war was beginning, telling him I wanted to use some vessels on the coast at Siam, but could buy foreign ships twenty fire per cent. cheaper than I could buy or build American vessels.

"His only response was, 'What is twenty-five per cent. difference to a patriotic man at the honors the Stars and Stripes?'

"It looks me as if the Secretary's reply must have been sarcastic, but I think it was not, and that it indicates a general ignorance of the subject and of the laws of trade, which to-day stands in the way of our attempt to re-establish our foreign commerce.

"If the Ship Bill comes before the Senate, the following candid sentiments are worth being weighed by the Republicans:

"To-day, by discriminations against our own people, we discourage our own merchants in the foreign trade from owning foreign built ships, and from employing our own countrymen to man them, while any foreigner can run the same ships in our foreign trade.

"A simple law of a few lines would remove this unjust and illogical discrimination, and take away the argument it gives to the extreme Free-traders and Democrats that we are blind prohibitionists of American foreign trade.

"In the past this has one been of much practical importance because our taxes, in the way of hospital money, consular fees, etc., hurden our unnecessary obstruction so managing ships in the foreign trade by various laws (intended to protect our seamen, but utterly failing to do so) in regard to the methods of shipping and discharging our men, have put the American flag at such disadvantage that merchants in the foreign trade were forced to send their goods by ships not sole foreign built and owned, but also manned by foreigners. Now with changes in the laws there would be more chance of our owning and navigating manning and running foreign-built ships, while it still would not immediately reduce in as much tonnage under our flag, unless a foreign war should occur.

"Still, it would be right, also, and expedient to remove the existing discrimination against our owning foreign-built ships of all sizes for the foreign trade.

"You still readily see that the same trade could be done cheaper by our competitors in these cheaper ships, and such has been the result to a large extent.

"Of course I can get my foreign goods carried under the English and other foreign flags, and should only be bankrupt if I tried to compete with them in American built vessels.

"I might then, as I can now, by hiring an English capitalist to play the part of owner, enjoy the empty honor of running ships under the British flag, but the game would not be worth the candle, after paying my English capitalist and my British ship-master, and now, from this and similar causes, the ownership of the carrying has gradually passed, with the ownership of the vessels, very largely into the hands of foreigners.

"It is easier to lose a trade than to regain it, and the right to own foreign ships for the foreign trade, with simply the advantage of the protection of the American flag, and of putting an American captain on their quarter-decks instead of an Englishman, and of paying the smaller hospital money which the proposed new law permits, would promise but slow growth to our tonnage until some foreign war booms up or breaks out. So the change I suggest would bear very little fruit in our recruited statistics of trade, and I advocate it chiefly because it is right and logical, and puts the Republican majority on record as correcting another of the mistakes of our navigation laws, and giving our merchants, ship masters, and seamen equal privileges in the foreign trade with foreigners, instead of discriminating against our own people, as we do now.

"I don't regard it as a panacea for the decline of our shipping, but only as one step toward putting our commerce into a position to avail of the next European war cloud or the next rise in the value of vessels. The free-traders in ships could not refuse it, and the time seems to me favorable for making the change.

"I think I know the policy which has governed the extreme men of the free-trade persuasion. They do not want free ships admitted to purchase, because the practical gain will be small, while the change would take away one of their strongest arguments for a radical and important change.

"This indifference of theirs to getting a small step might so induce the protectionists of our party as this critical juncture to put themselves right by taking the small step of admitting in the protection of the flag all foreign-built ships bought for the foreign trade about, so as to put American merchants, ship-masters, and seamen on as good a footing as foreigners are now.

"An Old China Trader."

WAGNER.

In another column the reader will find a careful review of the genius and career of Wagner, and in Harper's Monthly for March a paper upon Parsifal has a timely interest as a graphic description of the composer's last great triumph. Wagner was undoubtedly one of the great individual forces of the century. Across smiling uplands and lower heights the mighty Bernese Alps look to the Jura, and as over many a delightful group of charming composers the genius of Wagner towers responsive to that of Beethoven.

It is a revolutionary genius, and it can not be welcome to the musical taste which was trained and confirmed in another school. Its disciples are naturally intolerant of other styles, and unjust to other men. But that is the characteristic of all great innovations. As Emerson wisely says, if Nature would carry a point, she overloads the tendency.

In this country Theodore Thomas introduced Wagner, and it is one of his original musical services. He encountered much inertability and opposition, but he persevered and conquered. There is no doubt of the tendency of the musical taste of the later generation, and it is useless to deny or resist it. Wordsworth and Tennyson follow Byron, Jenny Lind succeeds Malibran, in the enthusiastic admiration of a new day. The most resolute skeptic of the "music of the future" who was so fortunate as to be present on the Wagner afternoon at the Musical Festival last May could no more withstand or deny the power and exquisite charm of that music than a leaf could help floating upon a stream. It was unhesitatingly a musical revelation to many a hearer, and it was certainly a triumphant reward for the fidelity of Thomas. Madame Materna and, as it ended, that she wished only that Wagner might have been in the great hall to hear this music rendered as it never had been rendered before. Wagner's influence in his own day has been great, and it is of a kind that will increase rather than decline.

PERSONAL.

Dr. McCosh advises the trustees of Princeton College to establish a school of philosophy equal or superior to any in this country. Attired as a Republic, with a Phrygian bonnet, and carrying a tricolor standard she passed the floor, rehearsing in a terrible voice fragments of Rouget de l'Isle's chorus, "Aux armes, citoyens," etc. But suddenly she uttered a piercing scream, dropped her flag, and threw herself into the arms of the actor Regnier. Some persons, he says, have already given him money to retain for "an undertaking so bond drawn up by our solicitors engaging on pay them a yearly sum during their natural life equal to 5 per cent per annum upon the capital amount"; so that the "General" seems to be safely started on the road to an infinite trade.

"From Tolland's Farm?"

"Ay, that's it," and Fludge threw his head back and laughed to his old manner again.

This half-witted fellow had gone back five years of his life nearly. Never did those years seem more like a bad dream to Fludge than with him-self at Skegs Shore again, and at his gust. Nev-er in all his life had he felt more proud and hap-py, and inclined to roar with laughter at his happiness, and then break down like a blubbering school boy, being confused and distraught, and not realizing the new position yet.

"Has anything happened?" Greg inquired.

"No. He wanted me, and here I am. Ho! ho!"

"And how long are you to remain, Fludge? How will you get back to Tolland's to-night?" asked Greg.

"I'm not going back on more," cried Fludge; "I'm here for good! Mr takes me back without a word—without a hard word to my agen me, just as I was when you were so many time a kid. Think of that?"

"I am thanking a t it," replied Greg, slowly.

"They said," remarked Fludge, dropping his voice into a husky whisper, as they passed into the stable-yard, "that the master never forgave; but he does! he does! he does! Look at me, Mr. Greg! Just see?"

"Yes, but don't make that infernal noise," cried Greg.

"I can't help it," answered Fludge; "I'm not settled dan n. When he sent word I was to come, I thought I should have gone clean raving mad for joy. Only to fancy I'm back again!" he cried, as he led Greg's horse into the stable, where Greg followed him, still anxious for a clearer light upon the case.

"Did he say why he wanted you?" inquired Greg.

"No."

"Have you asked him to come back?"

"I doesn't," said Fludge. "I thought it was settled clean I shouldn't be in this house again, that he never, never would do anything but hate me. I didn't expect it, Master Greg—I didn't for a blessed moment even."

"I suppose not."

"He thought I killed Morris Drake. He thought the very worst of me."

"He did."

"And isn't it like the five years back too, now? Lord's sakes! it's awful like. Ho! ho!" Fludge cried. "And the parson and his daughter in the house, just as it was, all but Morris. He can't come back—no more!"

"Do you wish he could, Fludge?"

"Yes."

"So do I."

And then Greg Dorward walked away, and left this new prodigal to attend to his horse, and en-ait by himself at the great change.

CHAPTER XVIII

AT LAST.

When Greg entered the farm parlor he found the occupants were Lucy Beake, her father, and Kitty. They were sitting very grave and silent, as if waiting for something, or some one, the tea things were on the table, and men smoking there, perhaps they were only waiting tea for John Woodhatch.

Were Greg's nerves quite so completely at his own command that day, or was he more than usually acute, to fancy there was a difference in their looks and manners which was foreign to their ordinary mouls?

There were no books or work about; the three inmates of the parlor were simply sitting still that afternoon, and with faces which had a story to tell.

"Good-afternoon," he said. "How is Miss Drake?"

"Miss Drake is worse," answered Mr Larcom, for sin tue, "much worse."

"That is bad news," said Greg. Then he glanced toward Kitty, whom he thought it strange also to find sitting there, who surely should have been by her mistress's side in the last awful hour when the night closes in for humanity, and the stars only shine.

"Yes, it is bad news," replied Kitty as she met his glance, and then her lips quivered, and she was silent.

"Has Mr Woodhatch been sent for?" asked Greg.

"He has not left the house-place to-day," Mr Larcom answered, "not entered a foot from the farm."

"Where is he, then?" asked Greg anxiously.

"Oh! upstairs with her. She will have no one else, no one at all, save an woman being in some whiles fifty yards of her room," said Mr Larcom, briefly, "not even a sweetheart of the Gospel, who would be of no small sarvecee to her peaceably at such a time as this."

"Where are the doctors?" asked Greg, as if the idea had struck him suddenly that the doctors might be of more service to Miss Drake in this present emergency than Alec Larcom or John Woodhatch. But this was not in his thoughts, although the Methodist thought it was, and scowled at him from under his shaggy gray brows.

"They've gone," cried Kitty; "oh! they have given her up—they can do no more, the only friend I have ever had is lost to me."

"Ye've lots of frootds, Kitty," muttered Mr Larcom, but Kitty shrugged her shoulders as though that remark was open to question, and she bent [illegible] to argue with him. Greg mean-while [illegible] and drew apart from the rest, with his face [illegible] from them, and his gaze directed to the fire-place, where some paper-work from Kitty Trant's deft fingers now displayed by way of ornamen decumtion.

"Mr Woodhatch has known Miss Drake a great many years, has he not?" Greg asked, after a short silence.

"A great many," answered Lucy.

"She will leave him all her money, then," said Greg, with a short, hard laugh, as struggels out of place in his remark, which certainly staggered Mr Larcom by its audacioucss.

"Do ye think that, Greg?" What's put that notion into your head?" he inquired. "Have ye heard anything, now, about it?"

"I don't know anything," was the absent an swer.

"John's rich enough without her money. And what he has he does not make good use of," said Mr. Larcom, "he wastes an awful heap of it on people who don't deserva it. He always did."

"He wastes it on the vile and criminal, you mean," replied Greg, half absently still, but with a ring of bitter satire in his words—"on those who reward his efforts for their good by sinking deep-e into evil, who, for the blessing he would bring to them, give back a curse. Like Kitty and me."

"No, no," cried Kitty. She had risen, and was standing by the door, to which she had crossed when arrested by Greg's words. "That is not true. I bring no curse to him."

"Ay, but there's some truth in what Greg says," remarked Mr Larcom, "and that is what I implied in part—not meaning ye or Kitty, though God forbeed it!"

"We are the height examples," muttered Greg; "that is very evident."

"I'm sure ye are," said Mr Larcom: "I was not thinking of either of ye two; don't fancy it. I'm not quite a bruse, Greg Dorward."

"I am glad to hear it."

Mr Larcom came to Greg's side, and put his red hand on his shoulder.

"What's come to ye, Greg, to-day?" he asked. "Ye are not often like this."

"I don't know," answered Greg, more gruffson by: "I am tired and out of temper. Don't mend me, Mr Larcom, I am."

Kitty listened to his reply, and then went out of the room. Lucy looked from to her fa-ther, but did not intrude upon their conversation.

"I have offended ye, Greg," Mr Larcom continued; "and though I say hard words, I don't go out of my way to give any mean offense. It is not the precedence of my office."

"It shouldn't be," said Greg.

"It is not."

Greg stared harder than ever at Kitty's fire or-nament as he said, "Whom were you thinking of when you said Mr Woodhatch wanted his money?"

"I was thinking of one or two who have gone away from here in John Woodhatch's time and toine," replied the parson.

"Were you thinking of Sjilkins fos um?"

"No. Though he was not a good sparcenum, I take it."

"A man who died with a lie in his mouth, Fludge tells me," said Greg, "but then Fludge is a strange beast too."

"He came here this afternoon. He has re-turned for good," commented Mr Larcom.

"For good?" echoed Greg; "yes, he says so."

The door opened again, and he looked round with a start, as though his nerves were unstrung that evening. It was Kitty who re-entered, and to whom Lucy cried,

"Can it be true? Will she see me?"

"Not yet," answered Kitty.

"Is Mr Woodhatch with her still?" asked the parson.

"Yes; he is writing to her dictation, I think; and he reads at times to her what he has writ-ten," answered Kitty, whose face was very white and rigid, as though the near approach of death had scared her. Greg, looking keenly at her, saw this; Lucy and her father had only glanced in her direction.

"She's making another will," almost mused Mr Larcom, "and taking no one's advcese but John's, but a more unprincipled man does not ex-ceet on mortal earth. Now if—"

"Kitty, what is the matter?" exclaimed Lucy, springing up with a half scream, as Kitty reeled slightly, and put her hand against the wall to save herself from falling.

"Nothing—nothing," answered the girl; "I shall be better in a minute. It is no close at hand?"

"I is our common inheritance," muttered Mr Larcom, like a man repeating one he holds to be of the stock phrases of his calling, "we [illegible] need to be afraid."

The door opened again sharply, and once more Greg Dorward started and looked over his shoul-der toward the new comer rather than at the old sweetheart, who had been shunned at the christen-ing of God a messenger. This time it was Mrs. Chamberton who entered, with an addition to the tea equipage. She was at Kitty's side at once, and looking steadfastly into her face.

"You are not well Miss Vanch," she said.

"No—yes, thank you, I shall be better in a minute," answered Kitty.

"You have been too constant in your attention to your mistress, you have worn yourself out," said Mrs. Chamberton, "and—and if you will al-low me to say so—"

"I am very strong," answered Kitty.

"How is Miss Drake now?" asked the house-keeper.

"Worse. She is raving mad again," said Kit-ty, with a shudder.

"Poor lady! Was she ever very sane, I won-der?" said Greg Dorward. "I should be glad to see her if I might be permitted at the last."

"Lord answers sharp and sudden on some prayers," a great writer has said or before this, and with a suddenness that was remarkable, a maid-servant of the farm opened the door imme-diately the words had escaped Greg, and said,

"If you please, Mr Woodhatch wishes to know if Mr Dorward has come back?"

"Did you not tell him?" asked Greg of Kitty.

"No," was the short reply.

"Yes, I am back, you see," he said, spreading his hands before the fire place, as though a fire was there and he was cold.

"Will you please to step upstairs, Mr. Dor-ward?"

"Upstairs," said Greg, rising to his feet; "certainly. Does Mr Woodhatch wish to see me?"

"Miss Drake wishes to see you, sir."

"Indeed!"

He straightened himself as though cramped by sitting in one attitude so long, and looked from Alec Larcom to his daughter Lucy, thence to Mrs. Chamberton and her much-worshiped daughter Kitty, dwelling longest on the last face, as if endeavoring to read those conflicting which was written for his behoof alone, unless the big dark eyes deceived him very much. After this he went steadily out of the room, and Kitty fol-lowed him, despite her new weakness, and a hand that had been suddenly put forth to restrain her by Mrs. Chamberton.

"Greg! Greg!" she exclaimed, in the corridor, and in an excited whisper, "don't go upstairs to-night!"

He stopped, and looked hard into her face.

"Why do you ask me not to go?"

"For your own sake."

"I have been there once before," he answered. "It is not the first time, Kitty, in our lives that we have seen the dead or dying. They went off pretty quickly at Bolter's Rents. Didn't they, girl?"

"Why do you speak of Bolter's Rents to-night?"

"I am so close to them," he answered.

"No, no—God forbid!"

"Over close," he added, as he moved on with Kitty's hand upon his arm.

"You will go, then?"

"Yes: what have I to fear?"

"Everything. Be on your guard, my poor Greg, for God's sake!"

Then Kitty left him—went with a rush and a sudden cry away from him, and he looked after her as a stupefied way for an instant before re-suming his progress upstairs. As the daylight fell upon him from the windows of the corridor it seemed a sad face enough, with a new resolve upon it, which gathered strength with every step he took. He did not falter in any way, but went on steadily to the door of the sick-room. Here he knocked and waited, listening to the heavy footsteps of John Woodhatch crossing the room to admit him. The door opened, and the master of Farm Forlorn stood in the entry, looking so stern and grave as he who stood on the threshold for admittance.

"You sent for me, Mr Woodhatch," said Greg.

"Miss Drake did, not I," answered Woodhatch. "You do not mind seeing her?"

"No. I have been saying down-stairs that I should be glad to see her once more in this life."

"Come in, then."

John Woodhatch put out his strong hand and took Greg Dorward by the wrist, and, after clos-ing the door behind him, led him into the room, like a little child who might not know his way, or who wanted guidance terrible, or who he feared might break from him and run shrieking from the house did he not hold him fast. Strange it was, the action, stranger still that at that mo-ment it should have reminded Greg of the old days when John Woodhatch brought him from the Reformatory at Bridwell's into the sunshine beyond his prison school and went with him on the road to Farm Forlorn.

They crossed the room together—there lured a thin, ghastly figure propped up by cushions in the bed, a human with deep, dark rings under wraith like eyes, which even large and black and lustrous, and with the dread seal of coming death upon her.

"Hester, he has come"

"I see," she whispered back; "now ask him"

"Now?"

"Yes—at once"

"Greg," said John Woodhatch, in a deep, hoarse voice, "this poor dying woman charges you with the murder of her brother Morris. Is that true?"

VALENTINES DAY.

Some sixteen hundred years ago to-day poor Bishop Valentine was beaten to death with clubs. No good reason has ever been offered for what truly will be called this somewhat harsh treat-ment of an eldorly prelate, but that his crime was considered insignificant or compared with his punishment once he informed from the fact that Mother Church has consecrated the 14th of Feb-ruary to his memory. On the other hand, it would be exciting a cruel reflection upon all the persons who assisted at his death to suppose that they thumped the old Bishop for no reason what-ever, like the little boys who appear in police courts for thumping a cat "just because it was there." It is contrary to common-sense to sup-pose that grown-up people would beat a bishop for the mere fun of the thing. It is at any rate more charitable to conjecture that he had in some way or other aroused local prejudice against him-self, and, for myself, I am quite ready to accept proof that he was put to death for having objected to his parishioners stealing valentines. If this was really the case—and there is no evidence to prove that it was not—it is easy enough to under-stand how warmly the pastoral and humble mind of those times would take up the question, and the whole crown of the outrage in at once pre-sented to the imagination.

The rector of the neighborhood, leaving their dogs to tend their simple flocks under the haw-thorns in the dales, had no doubt come into the town for the day to see their sweethearts, and there hearing for the first time of the somewhat foolish order that had gone forth from the epis-copal chair, were talking the matter over with something of that foolish noble indifference to youth, especially at spring-time, when, as had luck would have it, the old Bishop happened to come along. A glance at the prelate was suffi-cient to show that he, at any rate, had received no valentines for many a long year past, and if there is one thing more than another which de-flames youth, it is that dog-in-the-manger-ish spirit that sometimes prompts old age to forbid the young to frolic. The rest of the story is soon told. The Bishop, suspecting mischief from the angry looks of the knot of shepherd youths and their menacing gestures with their crooks, turned into a side way, and gradually quickening her steps, at last set off to run in his resolve or hard as he could go. This was too much for the lads, who, with a shout and a hallon, burst at once into chase. They soon overtook Dr Valen-tine, and each sweetheart as he passed by gave him a thump with his crook, and one thump being unfortunately harder than the rest, it killed him.

The rumor soon got abroad that the Bishop had been clubbed to death in his own front garden by a gang of ruffians from the hills, and all the girls of the place being interested in keeping the real facts a secret, the true story never came out. The sad event cast, no doubt, a gloom as the newspapers of the day said—over a large circle of sorrowing friends; but the Bishop who suc-ceeded to the diocese rescinded the stringent order, and it has never again been repeated.

I can not, of course, undertake to carry on the thread of episcopal history to our own days, and as it must suffice here to say that in the lapse of years in utterly ob-cured dirt the facts of the past became that the old Bishop's name actually got transferred to love-tokens and lovers gen-erally, and he himself, the poor, harmless, eccen-tric gentleman, has come down to us as the very high-priest of Love. Declare the revenges which the a bishopry of time brings round!

Fashion in valentines, however, changes, as on everything else. Only a few years ago these pretty billets doux were becoming "vulgar" and indeed in a very modern work the 14th of Feb-ruary is described as a "degenerated festival" upon which "peculiar anonymous letters are sent to persons one wishes to vex, and those chiefly by the humbler classes." Most servants and young fellows interchange such epistles with each other, no doubt conceiving that the joke is amazingly good." If the writer of such impiety had him-self received a "peculiar anonymous letter" of the kind he mentions, we can understand some of his spleen; but even such a libel upon the great fes-tival of lovers deserved all the wrath of Byron and his entry, with their resemblance. But a few years have worked a great change, and each suc-ceeding February has seen the tributes of the devotees of Cupid increasing in artistic beauty and in intrinsic costliness, so it may be that the Court of Love has now overlooked the ill that was once put upon its annual festival. It would, indeed, be an exacting deity that was not mollified by the extraordinary sacrifice now offered at the shrine of youthful love, for neadmen whom could be more beautiful than the little miracles of art which fill the shop windows with a flutter-ing burst of colors—ephemeral trifles too dainty almost to be moved from the box in which they nestle? Cupid might well be proud of his triumph as he surveys these patterns of affection-ate souvenirs—spring blossoms that have sud-denly come out full blown to a night, and so pretty in their exquisite imitation of nature, whether in shape, or scent, or hue, as the cool honeysuckle and cyclamen, lilies-of-the-valley and snow-drops, now to be found in the florists' win-dows. Flowers, of course, have always had mid mill entire the predecessor in emblems for the easier uses of love tokens, but modern art has ransacked nature in every corner, and there is hardly anything either beautiful or curious known to science that has not been impressed into the service of the sweetheart. Poets may prose how alike been filled for tender sentiments, and thus on the same sheet the same verse may send the gems of nature illustrated by gems of fancy to plead his cause. But the genuine valentine should be nothing more than a chastely eschlaun-ed expression of affection. Sweethearts—the pret-tiest word in the English language—should need no more substantial token of each other's devotion than gilded vows on love paper, decked out with here knots and all the other mystic symbols of the love-god's power, and yet, as if love were not all-suffering for lovers, the Fvarn of Hymen is meanlays affronted with offerings of solid worth and of practical utility. Tradesmen, trad-ing upon this affectation, freight their valentines with articles of the toilet and the dress, and the generous lovers, legadons of sinking bright eyes heighten by the mere supposition of their love, are to bribe them to sparkle with presents!

Sweethearts fortunately are always young, and to the valentine that asks no by treasured only for what it means, and not to be valued for what it is given, will ever be in abundant demand. For sweet sweetheart, looking like Walpole's awkward turtle-dove, "so affectedly as anything" over the sheet of trimmed-out hearts and interlacing will always be among us to [illegible] on the [illegible] of the 14th from generation to [illegible]. It would, indeed, be a pity if Valentine's Day [illegible] came, as New Year's has already [illegible] a tax upon friendship and relations, and instead of the thousand [illegible] kinds of sentiments between the unmarried, resigned into the serious duties of the [illegible] ing of Pepys's days, when all the citizens and ladies of London washed their hands in quaintnesses and well-to-do relations and rubbed them of presents. Yet though the signs of such a relapse seem somewhat threatening, and shop windows are dressed out rather to tempt the purse than to flatter Cupid, there is always room for hope so long as there are girls.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

I.

ON A NEW PHILOSOPHY: THAT POVERTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

It is commonly asserted that there are in the United States no classes, and any allusion to classes is resented. On the other hand, we constantly read and hear discussions of social topics in which the existence of social classes is assumed as a simple fact. "The poor," "the weak," "the laboring classes," are expressions which are constantly used as if they had exact and well understood definition. Discussions are constantly made to bear upon the assumed rights, wrongs, and misfortunes of certain social classes, and all public speaking and writing consists, in a large measure, of the discussion of general plans for meeting the wishes of classes of people who have not been able to satisfy their own desires. These classes are sometimes discontented, and sometimes not. Sometimes they do not know that anything is amiss with them until the "friends of humanity" come to them with offers of aid. Sometimes they are discontented and curious. They do not take their achievements on a fair measure of their rights. They do not blame themselves or their parents for their lot, as compared with that of other people. They raise claims against society, and they find orators, poets, and essayists to assure them that they have grievances.

It is very popular to pose as a "friend of humanity," or a "friend of the working classes." The character, he never, is quite extinct in the United States. It is borrowed from England, where some men, otherwise of small account, have assumed it with great success and advantage. Anything which has a charitable sound and a kind-hearted tone passes without investigation generally, because it is disagreeable to scoff at. Sermons, essays, and orations assume a conventional standpoint with regard to the poor, the weak, etc., and it is allowed to pass as an unquestioned doctrine in regard to social classes that "the rich" ought to "care for the poor," that charities especially ought to collect capital from the rich and spend it for the poor, that parishes ought to be clusters of institutions by means of which one social class should perform its duties to another, and that clergymen, economists, and social philosophers have a technical and professional duty to devise schemes for "helping the poor." The preaching in England used all to be done to the poor—that they ought to be contented with their lot and respectful to their betters. Now the greatest part of the preaching in America consists in injunctions to those who have taken care of themselves to perform their assumed duty to take care of others. Whatever may be one's private sentiments, the fear of appearing cold and hard-hearted causes those conventional theories of social duty and those assumptions of social fact to pass unchallenged.

Let us notice some distinctions which are of prime importance to a correct consideration of the subject which we intend to treat. Certain ills belong to the hardships of human life. They are natural. They are part of the struggle with nature for existence. We can not blame our fellow-men for our share of these. My neighbor and I are both struggling to free ourselves from these ills. The fact that my neighbor has succeeded in this struggle better than I constitutes no grievance for me. Certain other ills are due to the malice of men, and to the imperfections or errors of civil institutions. These ills are an object of agitation, and a subject of discussion. The former class of ills is to be met only by manly effort and energy. The latter may be corrected by associated effort. The former class of ills is constantly grouped and generalized, and made the object of social schemes. We shall see what that means. The second class of ills may fall on certain social classes, and reform will take the form of interference by one class on behalf of another. The last fact is no doubt the reason why people have been led, not noticing dissentions, to believe that the same method as applicable to the other class of ills. It will also be important, in order to clear up our ideas about the notions which are in fashion, to note the relation of the economic to the political significance of assumed duties of one class to another. Great confusion and consequent error is produced by allowing these two elements to become entangled in the discussion. Especially we shall need in notice the attempts to apply legislative methods of reform to the ills which belong to the order of nature.

There is no possible definition of "a poor man." A pauper is a person who can not earn his living; whose producing powers have fallen positively below his powers of consumption; who can not, therefore, pay his way. A human society needs the active co-operation and productive energy of every person in it. A man who is present as a consumer, yet who does not contribute either by land, labor, or capital to the work of society, is a burden. On no sound political theory ought such a person to share in the political power of the state. He drops out of the ranks of workers and producers. Society must support him. It accepts the burden, but he must be cancelled from the ranks of the citizen likewise. So much for the pauper. About him no more need be said. But he is not the "poor man." The poor man is an elastic term under which any number of social fallacies may be hidden.

Neither is there any possible definition of "the weak." Some are weak in one way and some in another, and those who are weak in one sense are strong in another. In general, however, it may be said that those whom humanitarians and philanthropists call the weak are the ones through whom the productive and conservative forces of society are wasted. They constantly neutralize and destroy the finest efforts of the wise and industrious, and are a dead weight on the society in all its struggles to realize any better things. Whether the people who mean no harm, but are weak in the essential powers necessary to the performance of one's duties in life, or those who are malicious and vicious, do the more mischief, is a question not easy to answer.

Under the names of the poor and the weak, the negligent, shiftless, unthrifty, silly, and imprudent are fostered upon the industrious and prudent as a responsibility and a duty. On the one side the terms are extended to cover the idle, intemperate, and vicious, else by the confusion gain credit which they do not deserve, and which they could not get if they stood alone. On the other hand, the terms are extended to include eager careerers of the healthiest rank, who are degraded by the combination. The reader who desires to guard himself against fallacies should always scrutinize the terms "poor" and "weak" he used, so as to see which or how many of these classes they are made to cover.

The humanitarians, philanthropists, and reformers, looking at the facts of life as they present themselves, find enough which is sad and unpromising in the condition of many members of society. They are wealth and poverty side by side. They note great inequality of social position and social chances. They eagerly set about the attempt to account for what they see, and to devise schemes for remedying what they do not like. In their eagerness to recommend the less fortunate classes to pity and consideration, they forget all about the rights of other classes, they gloss over all the faults of the classes in question, and they exaggerate their misfortunes and their virtues. They invent new theories of property, distorting rights and perpetrating injustice, as any one is sure to do who sets about the readjustment of social relations with the interests of one group distinctly before his mind, and the interests of all other groups thrown into the back ground. When I have read some of these discussions I have thought that it must be quite disreputable to be respectable, quite dishonest to own property, quite unjust to go one's own way and earn one's own living, and that the only really admirable person was the good for nothing. The man who by his own effort raises himself above poverty appears in these discussions to be of no account. The man who has done nothing to raise himself above poverty finds that the social doctors flock about him, bringing the capital which they have collected from the other class, and promising him the aid of the state to give him what the other had to work for. In all these schemes and projects the organized intervention of society through the state is either planned or hoped for, and the state is thus to become the protector and guardian of certain classes. The agents who are to direct the state action are, of course, the reformers and philanthropists. Their schemes, therefore, may always be reduced to this type: that A and B decide what C shall do for D. It will be interesting to inquire, at a later period of our discussion, who C is, and what the effect is upon him of all these arrangements. In all the discussions attention is concentrated on A and B, the noble social reformers, and on D, the "poor man." I call C the Forgotten Man, because I have never seen that any notice was taken of him in any of the discussions. When we have disposed of A, B, and D, we can appreciate better the case of C, and I think that we shall find that he deserves our attention for the worth of his character and the magnitude of his unmerited burdens. Here it may suffice to observe that, on the theories of the social philosophers to whom I have referred, we should get a new maxim of judicious living. Poverty is the best policy. If you get wealth, you will have to support other people, if you do not get wealth, it will be the duty of other people to support you.

No doubt one chief reason for the unclear and contradictory theories of class relations lies in the fact that our society, largely controlled in all its organization by the set of doctrines, still contains survivals of old social theories which are totally inconsistent with the former. In the Middle Ages men were united by custom and prescription into associations, ranks, guilds, and communities of various kinds. These ties endured so long as life lasted. Consequently society was dependent, throughout all its details, on status, and the tie or bond was sentimental. In our modern state, and in the United States more than anywhere else, the social structure is based on contract, and status is of the least importance. Contract, however, is rational—even rationalistic. It is also realistic, cold, and matter-of-fact. A contract relation is based on a sufficient reason, but on custom or prescription. It is not permanent. It endures only so long as the reason for it endures. In a state based on contract, sentiment is out of place in our public or common affairs. It is relegated to the sphere of private and personal relations, where it depends not at all on class types, but on personal acquaintance and personal estimates. The sentimentalism amongst us always arises upon the survivals of the old order. They want to save them and restore them. Much of the loose thinking also which troubles us in our social discussions arises from the fact that men do not distinguish the elements of status and of contract which may be found in our society.

Whether social philosophers think it desirable or not, it is out of the question to go back to status or to the sentimental relations which once united baron and retainer, master and servant, teacher and pupil, comrade and comrade. That we have lost some grace and elegance is undeniable. That life once held more poetry and romance is true enough. But it seems impossible that any one who has studied the matter should doubt that we have gained immeasurably, and that our farthest gains lie in going forward, not in going backward. The feudal ties can never be restored. If they could be restored, they would bring back personal caprice, favoritism, tyrannophoney, and intrigue. A society based on contract is a society of free and independent men, who form ties without favor or obligation, and co-operate without cringing or intrigue. A society based on contract, therefore, gives the utmost room and chance for individual development, and for all the self reliance and dignity of a free man. That a society of free men, co-operating under contract, is by far the strongest society which has ever yet existed, that no such society has ever yet developed the full measure of strength of which it is capable, and that the only social improvements which are now conservable lie in the direction of more complete realization of a society of free men united by contract, are points which can not be controverted. It follows, however, that one man, in a free state, can not claim help from, and can not be charged to give help to, another. To understand the full meaning of this assertion it will be worth while to see what a free democracy is.

NEW ORLEANS IN CARNIVAL GARB.

THE artistic and financial objects of the New Orleans Carnival are now too well known to demand any detailed history or explanation, and even the aspect of that singular metropolis during its celebrated holiday has become familiar to a degree that precludes some reflection upon the peculiar loss of individuality which the city will appears to undergo at the epoch in question. A very considerable number of those who visit New Orleans at Carnival-time do so quite as much for the sake of seeing the city itself as of witnessing the great pageant. But during Mardi Gras the place is disguised by its holiday garb—almost as much so, indeed, as the King of the Carnival—the native picturesqueness of the quainter districts is overlaid and concealed by the artificial pic turesqueness of the occasion. The limits the streets themselves marked, so much are their salient features concealed by those innumerable wooden frame-works temporarily erected to provide against the falling of galleries under an unaccustomed burden of spectators. The romantic charm of the old city is not readily obtained at such a time; the curious cosmopolitan characteristics that offer themselves to artistic eyes in other seasons are lost in the affray of American clothes, and true local color is fairly drowned out by the colors of Rex. There really exists for the artist and the poet many rich sources of inspiration in quaint New Orleans, but those sources gush more freely at other times. Then are difficult to discover during the passing and squeezing of Carnival excitement. To see the Queen of the South in her most natural and pleasing mood one should visit her during that dreamy season called St. Martin's summer, when the orange blossoms exhale their fragrance, and the weeds are still lukewarm, and the autumn glow bronzes those finest tints which the old-fashioned edifices wear. Then the curious confusion of gables and balconies gracefully jutting against the blue above, the picturesque oddity of the shadows wrought below, give the more antiquated streets a peculiarly impressive aspect—a foreign look not of this hemisphere nor even of this century. There also linger the Latin tongues of Southern Europe with softer syllabification, tempered by those conservative climatic forces which make themselves manifest even in the transplantation of language; and together with those Mediterranean dashes one hears that remarkable creole patois which in the mouth of a woman or a child has a fantastic sweetness rivaling the most cultured Polynesian speech. Deep surprises of green refresh the eye that peeps through the half-opened gates of dreamy old creole courts—the broad sattered silk of banana leaves, tropical creepers chasing their upward way over trellis-work, vines curling and clinging, lizard footed ivy, the sinister "Spanish moss," perhaps a young palm also, plumed like a cockatoo. In those quaint interiors the colonial life still endures together with many reasons things bearing as little relation to modern ideas and fashions as the New Orleans of Monsieur Lescaut to the Crescent City of to-day. In that season the nights are tepid, vast, wine-colored, like the Homeric ocean, and vibrant with an infinite variety of insect music. From the bayous and the low lands come sounds as of ghostly violins, phantom flutes, elfish bells, mocking birds affect their weird and manderful paiuoge, immense beetles fizz by, airsick ones crickets work their invisible bazz-saws, frogs hold fantomahlary converse—every surface inch of land or water seems to possess a voice of its own; the waterlilies speak one unto the other, the shadows converse. And through the Egyptian uniformity of the landscape the Mississippi serpentines its way with Nilotic ordenarily, as coiling that to dwellers upon its eastern bank the sun appears, as in the Modern prophecy, to rise in the west.

Few of the real attractions of New Orleans are likely to be observed by Carnival visitors, bewildered as they are by the great eddying of people, the confusion of preparation, the general inappropriateness of the moment to curious research and romantic investigation. But a Carnival night in New Orleans, during the coming and going of the great display, offers in itself much remarkable material for study—at least to one who can look about him unbewildered by the surging of the enormous crowd. Canal Street presents its long deep vista of illumination—monograms of fire, cagira of flame, lashlove of light, blaze along the way; and the uncommon breadth of the great thoroughfare, with its starry lines of electric lamps threading the middle, appears to be increased by the luminosity. For eight miles in right and left the city begins to empty its population into the great central highway, through all the tributary streets and alleys, and the force of that human circulation is resistless—to strive against the current is out of the question. The physician or telegraph messenger whom duty summons in an opposite direction at such a time must take the middle of the street if he hopes to reach his destination. Rising one above another through the glow of illumination, the broad galleries packed with spectators seem like the tiers of an enormous hippodrome. When the human spring-tide has reached its fullest the pageant issues from its hiding place, and sails by like a gorgeous Armada, while the ocean of witnesses ebbs away in its wake. That Canal Street offers, in a large sense, the best view of the procession is beyond dispute; but the strictly local picturesqueness of the exhibition may be studied to advantage in the antiquated French by-ways. The Canal Street spectacle is imposing, but not unique. Under similar conditions a street of equal breadth in any other great modern city would offer a spectacle of magnificence scarcely inferior. The grotesque silhouettes of the moving panorama are partially lost in such a street—the shadows can not reach the sides of the buildings. But through the queer old streets of the French quarter the Carnival procession must almost squeeze its way, casting eccentric shapes of darkness upon the walls, and lighting its path with such light that flings upward the shadows of projecting galleries, and lends much Rembrandtesqueness to the faces peering down from balconies or dormer windows. The artist whose very impressive sketch accompanies this brief article has effected a happy compromise between the broad glory of the Canal Street view and the still older aspects above described. The effect has been seized at the moment the long panorama is passing the corner of the old Rue Royale, on that we have a suggestion of the side street view and of the central thoroughfare at once.

After the pageant has gone glimmering, and the whirl of the midnight ball is over, day dawns upon a scene of merry wreck. Streets are strewn with fragments of brightly colored paper, tatters of tinsel, remnants of torn decorations; perhaps some gorgeous wagon, or "float," disabled during the great review, may be seen lying abandoned at some point of the route, like a gold freighted galleon astrand. Last vent did not the eyes of early morn behold, glittering upon Canal Street, North, the ruined gates of the New Jerusalem? But the city soon rids itself of all these souvenirs—the wrecks and waifs mysteriously vanish, the pictured Carnival journals are devoured by the post-office, the King's standards cease to flit the streets with shadowy flutterings, the intricate paraphernalia of illusionmino are removed, and the ordinary system of New Orleans returns to the normal condition. Only the unsightly skeleton woodwork still shoulders up the galleries to provide against accident upon the 4th of March, which is "Firemen's Day." Already the Carnival socletes are actively preparing for the display of 1884. Ere long the moist and odorous spring will blow in the streets, and the city will gradually sink down into its long and dreamy summer languor, the pulses of its commercial life still beat more slowly with the lengthening of the days, the forest of masts along its eighteen miles of wharves will dwindle as the autumnes thicken, the wilderness of smoking chimneys at its edge and rotton landmarks will diminish, and the unmodest and burning season will come, with warm winds and lightnings from the Gulf, with clouds splendid and ponderous as those of geologic eras, when the heavens were heavy with vaporized iron and gold.

LAFCADIO HEARN.

THE HOUSE OF REFUGE AND THE JESUITS.

THE "New York House of Refuge" has for nearly sixty years kept on its quiet and useful career. The names of our most astute and benevolent citizens have been connected with its history and its labors. It has been singularly successful. It has been kept free from the entanglements of politics and the rivalry of religious sects. Almost alone of all our institutions, it has been managed with honesty and good faith. No annual peculation, of favoritism, or political corruption rests upon it. That after vast it has gathered in its throng of juvenile offenders, and labored with wise tenderness to save the young from the effects of their own folly. Without a trace of sectarianism, of partisanly, or of politics, it has drawn to the neglected and the lost of every creed and almost of every nation, and its records show that thousands of the reclaimed in every part of the country have owed their success in life to its prudent care. It is naturally one of the favorite institutions of New York, the pride of a city to which benevolence has never been a stranger, and almost the first visit the foreign philanthropist who comes among us makes is to the House of Refuge.

After sixty years of peaceful meditiness the House of Refuge has brought upon itself the bitter hostility of the extreme section of the Roman Catholic church. It is unsectarian it is free from stain. The Catholic Union is resolved that it shall no longer continue or: and for several years a bill has been annually presented to the Legislature designed to change the whole policy of the institution, and separate its children into various sects. They are to be made to follow the "religion of their parents." The strict lines of sectarianism are to be drawn by no act of the Legislature. The Roman Catholic priesthood are to be authorized to enter the institution, select the children they claim as their own, and train them up in the Roman Catholic faith. The Board of Managers are made powerless to prevent the invasion, they are to look on while the priest gathers his victims, and the parents of the unfortunate children they have abandoned or educated in the ways of vice are empowered to decide upon their religious creed. The ritual, the forms, and the emblems of the foreign Church are to be established in the Reformatory. The denominational system of education is to be unchanged for one intensely sectarian. Religious differences are once more to be recognized among those who are alike in crime. The practice of sixty years is to be changed, and the House of Refuge converted into a poor copy of the sectarian charities that have long been broken up by law in Italy and Spain.

For several years the bill has come annually before the Legislature, and has been defeated. This year it is brought forward with new zeal and even assurance. The Roman Catholic priesthood demand, as their reward for political services, the sacrifice of the House of Refuge. It has even threatened the wholesale of its political support, so bitter is the hostility of the extreme religious faction against this old and popular charity that they would crush it altogether. But we think they have underrated the real interest of the people of New York in the House of Refuge, and they have overestimated their own power. The situation of their own institutions may at any moment become critical. The rapid growth and great influence of the Roman Catholic charities, schools, colleges, convents, churches, asylums, is one of the chief dangers of our political future. They are wholly undemocratic. They teach the darkest forms of European conservatism, and the love of rank, caste, and barbaric titles and dignities, robes and decorations, that are dying out in Europe itself. With in their mediæval depths there is no room for republicanism. Yet they are fed by enormous subsidies from a republican people. The Protectory, founded by Bishop Ives to preserve and extend the Roman Catholic faith, has nearly $30,000 a year from a Protestant or liberal community. The New York Foundling Asylum, an institution secret and mysterious, has nearly as much more. The schools of the Sacred Heart and the Orphan Asylum receive in donations and remission of taxes great sums. It would not be an excessive estimate to compute at nearly a million of dollars yearly the amount contributed by the city of New York to the support of a Church that is perfectly able to maintain itself. And yet these grants are all in direct violation of the State Constitution, which forbids the appropriation of the public money to sectarian charities and uses.

The managers of the House of Refuge naturally object to the principle of the bill as unconstitutional and unwise, and to defeat the aim of their institution. They state that it will bring with it disorder and sectarian strife, that the privilege proposed to be bestowed on the Roman Catholic clergy is unprecedented and dangerous. They urge that the young offenders committed to their charge are the wards of the State, that they are taken from the care of their parents and their churches because they have been suffered to become dangerous to the community, and that the State alone should direct the means to be employed for their reform. They show that their institution is wholly unsectarian, and open to the ministers of all religious sects. One sect alone is dissatisfied. The Roman Catholic clergy and the Jesuit league demand from the Legislature a version control over the House of Refuge. Their intolerant zeal may be successful with the present Legislature. They may crush or they may rule the favorite charity of New York. They may make use of their opportunity with unrelenting bigotry. But they will have set the people of the city and State to meet and assert us. Then will find that the day of retribution must come at last.

RUSSELL LAWRENCE.

HARDENING—IN WINTER.

On the 10th of last January I went to the funeral of one of the oldest of the contributors to this journal, to forty-eight hours he had been stricken down by acute pneumonia. The day was bitterly cold; the snow fell into the open grave; the biting wind, at many degrees below the freezing-point, whistled among the bare trees at Woodlawn. A group of twenty gentlemen was gathered in that bleak place, old friends and elderly friends of an elderly man; these ages must have averaged sixty years and over. It is the age near which the constant danger of pneumonia—that disease so fatal in our climate—increases. Judges, lawyers, literary men, men of business, were there, you could not easily gather a group that should represent a higher average intelligence.

Now mark how much ignorance and carelessness these experienced elderly gentlemen could display respecting their health and their really valuable lives. Not a single man of them was properly protected against the menacing cold. I made a particular and statistical note of their negligence. Only one of the twenty wore a scarf around his neck; in the case of four the tide of hygienic intelligence was high enough to induce them to turn up the collars of their overcoats. Nearly all of them stood bare-headed in that Siberian wind for fifteen or twenty minutes. It was a beautiful bravado, if you choose to look at it in that way. But these gentlemen took a risk that was greater than that of some battle-fields. They were inviting death; they were calling upon pneumonia to take them as their friend had just been taken.

I suggested to one of the eldest of the company, a man of seventy years, to protect his neck and chest a little better against the winter day. "Oh," said he, "I don't mind the cold; the cold hardens me!" Like most of the otherwise intelligent elderly gentlemen who were gathered around that grave, he believed that to take mortal risks was "hardening." Yet he, like all of us, know how often mortal illness is brought on by exactly such exposure as this.

On that day the skating was excellent on stream and pond and rink in many a burgh around New York. Returning from Woodlawn, I stopped a few minutes at one of the less-frequented skating grounds in the Central Park. On the ice I found an eminent scientist, a man of perhaps forty-eight years. Not heavily clothed, though with abundant warm wraps in keeping near by, this sedentary professor, whose researches in physics do him to his laboratory for half of each day at least, was fleeting over the ice with the agility and speed of a youngster. He was competing with his son for the earliest mastery of an accomplishment dear to skaters, and known as the "backward outer edge."

Now the professor had given an more attention to the subject of physiological winter exposure than the gentlemen from whom I had parted at Woodlawn had given. Still, he had hit upon the tooth of the matter. The two scenes of the same afternoon illustrated the wrong and the right methods of hardening. At Woodlawn my friends were permitting the cold to attack and so master them as they stood under the sky, opposing only a passive resistance to its onslaught. They were insufficiently protected. But with even less protection from clothing, my friends at the skating grounds were warm, comfortable, and safe from the cold. And why? Because they were keeping themselves warm in the cold. In the true physiological sense they were hardening themselves against the cold. And more than this, they were getting the best exercise in the world for strong and healthy people in a winter time. Afterward they put on their wraps.

The distinction lies there. One is not hardened by becoming cold, on the contrary, becoming cold is injurious. It is at the least a strain upon the system. It may cause a serious or even a fatal injury, as when it leads to acute or chronic disease—pneumonia, phthisis. Only when the sensation of cold is followed by a brisk reaction, as when one feels a warm glow after a plunge into cold water, is the unpleasant sensation of cold beneficial. The golden rule for hardening is to keep warm in the cold. It is in resisting, not in enduring, the cold that virtue lies.

And the best defense from the cold is that which comes from active physical exercise. By walking, horseback riding, skating, rowing, one is warmed from within, and it is the best way. When on a better day I start for a three-mile walk, I find it cold work for the first fifteen minutes. One's nose here the hardest time of it; how they tingle and smart when the cold air strikes upon the thin, tender, expanded membranes! But the brisk exercise sets the blood coursing to them; in a longer or shorter time, according to one's constitution—science takes no account of the length of the race in this case—the blood comes back briskly to them. Then after about a mile's walk for mine to get warm. Then the whole frame is in a glow, and the day seems turned from winter to spring. So far as the cold is concerned, one feels as if he could walk "on the horizon's farthest rim" without fatigue. Such a winter's walk, or skating, for the strong, is the best toughening for the season. Weaker persons must take gentler exercise.

But when it is not a question of exercise for toughening? What are we to do when, as at Woodlawn the other day, or as in sleigh-riding, it is a question of making only a passive resistance to the cold?

It is simply a question in this case of retaining the natural heat of the body. Without exercise there is an strengthened circulation to flood the extremities with the vital heat from within. What is needed is abundant wraps and warm clothing—the more the better. When the exposure is unusually long and severe, as sometimes in sleigh-riding, you can not have too much—shawls, overcoats, scarfs, hot-water bottles for the feet, and so on. You will not be overheated when you are sitting still in a winter atmosphere, a little motion in removing the wraps is all that is necessary. But if, on the other hand, you are taking the stirring exercise of walking, or skating, or rowing, then scarcely any exposure will injure the healthy constitution; all that is needed then is warm clothes and shelter when the exercise is over.

In a word, to suffer from cold is injurious. There is no virtue in unprotected exposure. Cold resisted, and not cold experienced, is the tonic thing. The reader who fails to distinguish this rum with every winter an increasing chance of ending where this paper began—at Woodlawn.

TIMOTHY MORSON COAN.

THE FLOODS OF THE OHIO.

From the meeting of its swift confluent streams in the grimy gorge of Pittsburgh to its lazy debouchure into the Mississippi at the swampy lowlands of Cairo the course of "the beautiful river" is 975 miles. Throughout all this meandering length there are no cataracts, and only once during the year is there any obstruction in navigation—at Louisville—are there rapids, cradled in so rivers by a straight canal cut through a low peninsula. The width of the river varies from 1000 feet to 3000. The declivity of the banks on either hand is for the most part gentle, after the stream has cleared its native hills, and the aspect of the banks, rich or they are with "the pomp of cultivated nature," bearing for miles and miles through the State to which the river gives its name the trellised terraces of fruitful vineyards, is of a tame and languid beauty. The fluctuations in the depth of water are very great. From the shallowness to which the stream is shrunken during the summer heats to the turbid flood it rolls by the vernal or the autumnal forty-five rainy days, the variation is enormously forty-five to fifty, sometimes sixty, as in the last, is often fifty, and sometimes sixty, as in the memorable and calamitous flood of 1832, as which memorable and calamitous flood of 1832, as which it is necessary to revert for comparison with the disaster of last week, which will henceforth become the measure of disaster, for at Cincinnati the river has now attained a depth of sixty five feet and an inch, ten inches beyond the mark set fifty-one years ago; and at Louisville, even after the pent-up waters had broken down the dam, and diffused themselves over the spaces defended by it, the depth was but eight inches less. The rise of the river in time along the whole course of the stream near twenty feet beyond the mean yearly rise.

Words and even more graphic pictures can not convey a true sense of this ruin, much less when the submergence is that of the foundations of a great city. The image which New-Yorkers can form in their minds of the effect of a tide fifteen feet above high-water mark in the East and North rivers can be but a faint image of the wreck that has been wrought at Cincinnati. Among the most interesting features of the river are the natural terraces, sometimes seventy-five feet above its present surface, which, as geologists agree, mark the level of the bed over which it flowed, and which is composed of the alluvium it deposited, far, far back of the beginning of historic time, for the mounds which must have been built two thousand years ago conform to what are still the banks and the bed of the stream. Upon two of these terraces, the lower sixty feet above the river, the upper fifty feet above the lower, rises the city of Cincinnati, its dwellings and its shops upon the terraces, its wharves, its railway stations, and its streets of lower traffic upon the alluvial level below, with the humbler dwellings of such citizens as constitute the shore population of a river town. The contour of the shore is slightly bowed outward, and at the lower end of the curve Mill Creek flows in to join the Ohio, a hale almost opposite the centre of the city, on the Kentucky side, empties the small stream which divides Covington from Newport. The spring freshets in this stream often do great damage to the wharves opposite its mouth, and in this flood also this stream, "nothing its own of more to that which had too much," has contributed its outers to the submersion of Lower Cincinnati.

The floods of the upper Ohio were a week earlier than at Cincinnati, where on serious apprehensions were felt until Sunday, February 11. At seven o'clock that night the river was over sixty-one feet high, and rising at the rate of two inches an hour. The approaches to the bridges, including the great suspension-bridge, were cut off. The valley of Mill Creek, in which was the station of the Cincinnati Southern road, was submerged, and traffic was almost stopped. By Monday night the river had risen nearly ten feet more, the gas-works were under water, and the supply of gas exhausted, and near two thousand people had been turned out of their houses. On Tuesday the whole line of miles of the river-front were under water, and the lower city was patrolled in boats. In the morning the station of the Cincinnati Southern road yielded to the sapping of its foundations, and fell apart into the flood in two pieces. It was feared that many buildings more had been so undermined that they would fall when the water subsided. Only one railroad was in complete operation. The "criminales" of the loss both of life and of wealth are more a bit guesses, though there seems reason to believe that the former is slight, while the latter is certainly enormous. The suburbs, especially on the Kentucky side, suffered not less than the lower city; two hundred acres of the most populous part of Newport were under water. The water at the narrower parts of the river hid the whole "bottoms," and stretched from the Ohio to the Kentucky hills.

Louisville stands upon a plateau seventy feet and more above the river, and the city proper was thus inaccessible even in these unheard-of floods. But between this plateau and the river at the lower end of the city is a wide strip of suburbs bordering the rapids, which is traversed by the canal cut to avoid them, and this lowland is Shippingport. Some distance up the stream the plateau recedes, and another strip of lowland, the bottom of Beargrass Creek, intervenes between it and the river. This is or was contained with a "cut-off dam" at the upper end, and when the flood was at its highest the level of the ground was some fifteen feet below the level of the water. On Monday night the pressure became too great for the dam to withstand. It gave way, and the water poured over it in a torrent which rapidly spread into a lake. The dwellers on the lowlands could not believe that a river beside which they had lived all their lives, and which had never washed them out of their houses before, would do so then, and most of them were in bed and asleep when the deluge overtook them. Strange to say, though the estimate of the number of people left houseless is more than 5000, the number of lives entombed as he lost is less than fifty. The suddenness and force with which the water came in, instead of lapping its way up inch by inch as elsewhere, crushed and entered away and flung together the fine houses in its way, so that the lowlands at Louisville presented a far more vivid picture of chaos come again than the more destructive deluge at Cincinnati.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

M. Maumené, who has been experimenting in La Manche with the ice-plant, the botanical name of which is Mesembryanthemum crystallinum, finds that it furnishes a striking illustration of the eclectic power of roots to take from a complex soil the materials necessary to their growth. His experiments show that the plant consists of a solution of alkaline salts held by a vegetable tissue the weight of which is less than two per cent. of the total mass. He suggests that the cultivation of the ice-plant for its yield of potash might be profitable under certain conditions, and thinks that at any rate it would be useful in removing from the salt ground on the Mediterranean coast the excess of alkaline salts which renders that soil unproductive.

An example of economy in funerals was set by the late Lord Keane, of England, who said in his will, recently admitted to probate, that his funeral must not cost more than $250. He will further says, "My father's cost $500, which I consider a shameful waste of money."

The Senate voted a few days ago to put "beine" on the free list. Then the Senators sent to the dictionaries and cyclopædias to learn what "beine" was, but in vain. Senator and Editor Hanley came to their relief with the remark: "If typographical errors are to be put on the free list, we shall have no protection."

The career of a Creek Indian as a man of means was brief and sad. When the "nuptial money" was distributed, a short time ago, one of Eu-lan's band received $2000. He went away over his good fortune, and on the following morning he shot two of his companions in an attempt to capture him another Indian was mortally wounded, and he himself was killed by his pursuers.

SAVANNAH'S SESQUICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.—From Sketches by Horace Bradley.—[See Page 118.]

WILLIAM EARLE DODGE.

Mr. William E. Dodge died at his residence on Madison Avenue in this city on Friday, February 9, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. His illness was of brief duration. His nervous force, taxed by long years of restless activity, succumbed under an attack which in a younger man would not have been serious. But it was characteristic of the man that he fell with his armor on, almost in the midst of that prolonged, earnest, and hopeful fight to which his life had been devoted, in support of the principles dear to his heart. Mr. Dodge was perhaps the best known of the many famous merchants of New York who were his contemporaries. His wealth was not equal to that of many, and he had deliberately chosen not to link his name with any great work of benevolence. But a man who had the habit of giving away a quarter of a million of dollars every year whose generosity counted its beneficiaries in every State of the Union and in many foreign lands, and who gave to the distribution of his wealth not only when it was great, but when it was not inconsiderable, more time and thought than he [illegible] fact that [illegible] an honorable ambition to be known to posterity as Astor and Lenox are known [illegible] and grateful hearts [illegible] book of remembrance where only Divine recognition awaits it.

Mr. Dodge was unquestionably a distinguished man of business. His keen intellect and untiring energy, his foresight, his grasp of the movements of population and exchange, his admirable tact and judgment in dealing with men, and, above all, his profound and unyielding fidelity to principle, were recognized by the leaders in the great mercantile community. His enterprises were vast and varied. Not the merchant princes of Venice or Holland, whose fame made the fame of the cities in which they dwelt, gave ampler scope to their enterprises, or imprinted upon them more indelibly the seal of their comprehensive minds. In the course of his mercantile career Mr. Dodge wielded a potent influence in the development of the rich resources of the whole continent. is rather as a philanthropist and a practical Christian, whose busy life was regulated day by day by the light of his religious beliefs, and who carried into the occupations of a man of affairs the chivalrous piety of a HAVELOCK. Mr DUNCK was an earnest believer in the doctrines of Christianity, and a devoted member of the Presbyterian Church, but his zeal was as catholic as the former, and as intense and persistent as the latter. He was specially interested in missionary work. While yet young he became a member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, being made a corporate member in 1857, and Vice-President in 1864, to which office he has steadily re-elected for seventeen years. At the same time he became (1870) a director of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. He was a warm friend of the Syrian Protestant College in Beyrout, of which one of his sons, the Rev. D STUART DUNCK, was a professor, and the principal, Rev. De JESUP, his nephew by marriage. He was also a generous contributor to the Robert College in Constantinople, and to the Liberian University. In our own country, many of his benefactions were in the cause of education, and particularly of education for the Christian ministry. The Union Theological Seminary in this city, the Auburn Theological Seminary, Williams, Amherst, Yale, Middlebury, Lafayette, Grinnell, and others, shared his bounty for professorships, scholarships, and buildings. With his appreciation of the practical value of organization and association, Mr. DUNCK successfully aided largely in public works, but he found the means—and what was more generous in him, the time and the thought—to do far more in private. He was noted for the staidness with which he conformed his life to his convictions. He resigned from the Union League Club, with whose objects he was earnestly in sympathy, and of which he had been an honored member, because the club desired a profit from the sale of its wines; he left the directory of the Erie Railroad, with the organization of which he had been intimately connected from the start, because it ran trains on Sunday, and he gave up his interest in other roads for like reasons. With these scruples, in the present condition of public sentiment, he found small sympathy, but though one of the gentlest of men, and reliving with singular confidence on the friendship of those by whom he was surrounded, he had no difficulty in doing what he believed the moral law required. He has left behind him a name that will be peculiarly honored not only in the great city which had been his home for sixty-five years, but throughout the Union and in other countries.

It is not only invalids and children who delight in Mellin's Food, but a large class of consumers whose digestions require delicate treatment. The food is so nourishing, so delicious, that it would be strange if it were regarded as merely a baby's dish, to be taken as a concession to something else. This preparation has become well known in nearly every household throughout the country, but as there are always new babies and new invalids, it is well to be reminded of some of the food's excellent qualities, and that there is a preparation which dyspeptics, having once tried, will never be without. Those who, by ordinary of reputation will find Mellin's Food better than medicine, and the concentration of nourishing properties. Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes—it is the only Soap that will prevent the dish rag Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, &c., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish rag don't blame your servants; it is not their fault, for you have given them a rag made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish-rag, use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real Indefatigable Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paint, Windows and Mirrors, Wire-gilt ice, Cabinets, and all other Varnish ordinary soaps, as in most houses, do not fit for washing glass; while The Frank Siddalls Soap is the most elegant thing for this purpose that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat or be troubled with sores of any kind when bathing in The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, its ingredients being so pure and mild.

Do not use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—dead roses would them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease, and without causing a scratch. The Soap does not have to be rinsed off

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Barber at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy, all all may great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is on a different from that of any Shaving Soap that the opportunity is almost incredible that we can say that no razor, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how ropy the beard, can The Frank Siddalls Soap and Soap Cup will always be found excellent.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE: It washes freely in hard water, and where water has to be carried from sea like that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is a safe, a sweeter to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Sores, Galls, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Carriages, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable, while for washing cars on long wind trips, cleaning the running gear and bodies of horse-carriages, (without a rival) by its use paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

It is elegant for washing Printers' Rollers, for washing the ink from Type, Electrotypes, etc., and for washing Printing Ink from the hands.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient, its importance is becoming more and more widely known and appreciated, and it is rapidly superseding Imported Castile and Alma as soap for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

USE OF SOAP IN SHAVING

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nails and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing Old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds, and Burns; for washing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults; for sore lips, persons suffering with Salt Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face, and for abortion affected with Scaly Eruptions. It is with a use of the fourteen above as often experienced along other soap to heal, while for washing an invalid he is most valuable and to the Physician, by the thoroughness with which it removes the odor from the skin that could otherwise tend to counteract the action of his medicines by clogging up the pores, and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for Washing Sores on the Feet, caused by walking or wearing tight shoes.

Always have plenty of the lather on—don't rinse the lather off.

For washing Gunshot Resistors and Mortars it is better than anything else.

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the skin; The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients, which soon passes away, even in the lightest, and never leaves any odor on the skin. The face never has any of the unpleasant gloss that other soaps produce; it should also not be used for washing the hands and face of those troubled with chapped skin, as it will not fix the chaps. The Frank Siddalls Soap is used by doctors to remove the odor from the dreadful ichorous discharging that even Imported Castile Soap often causes; it always leaves the skin soft and smooth.

No tooth powder or tooth wash will compare with it.

A little on the tooth brush to rub on the gums, teeth and gums perfectly clean.
It leaves a pleasant and agreeable taste, a cool breath and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted for toilet use in the hot water of Hot and Cold Fountains

PERSONS WHO DESIRE A MUSTY SPONGE or WASH-RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Whenever either a sponge or wash-rag bears disagreeable smell, it is due entirely to the air called the toilet Soap that is put with it. In the place of soap, keep a sponger or washer in water and clean it, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any necessity for a spoon in the air or mine.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing, plenty of the rich white lather result in it the thatest water used out; it entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic Bay Rum, Brushing, Pomade, or any hair dressing. Dandruff is not identified, the hair will not collect dust, and there will be no dry feeling of the scalp. Cuffs, Collars, Shirt Linings and Neck-wear will keep clean much longer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior to Benzine or Ammonia for Cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing Grease Spots, and is guaranteed not to injure the garment

AND NOW FOR THE CLEAN, NEAT, EASY, GENTEEL, LADYLIKE FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions—any child over 12 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them.

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used NOT EVEN TO HEAT THE WASH WATER and as the tub or a dipper must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in the Soap

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle
THE FIRST TIME, no matter how old it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

The cause to always make the last water soapy: the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as it never were, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will look better.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any such ingredient; don't use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap on any of them, it

FIRST—Inspect the garments in a tub of lukewarm water; draw it out on a wash board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it or several wash it, being particular not to rub dirty any of the rolled pieces.

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as a piece is rolled when it is to sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the PIECES, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash board AND THE DIRT WILL DROP OFF; turn the garment inside out to get at the seams, but DON'T use any more Soap, DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DON'T wash through a few suds. If the washwater gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too hot the hands add some hot water out of the tea Kettle.

If a Streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and Never it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, one to put THE PIECES OF OUTSIDE TO THE SUN, AFTER A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-rinse UNTIL THE WATER IS TURNED DELICATELY BLUE. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 30 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER

THE TARIFF DEBATE.

THE debate upon the tariff has been very useful, although from the first there was a general conviction that neither party in Congress really wished to take definite action. The use of the discussion has been its effect upon public opinion, for there is no doubt that the whole question of a tariff tax is better understood because of the long debate in Congress and in the press. There are many reasons why the actual interest in the subject upon the part of the general public seems so limited and languid. There is a great national debt to provide for, and it is agreed that the money must be raised by indirect taxation. Tradition has accustomed the country to some form of protective tariff as the best means at once of providing the money and of fostering American industry, so that the proper principle of a revenue tariff is not only ill understood, but it is represented as hostile to American interests, and therefore unpatriotic. Under this policy great vested interests have grown up, and however unsound their basis may be, any sudden and radical change would be an injustice. These interests affect members of Congress like all other citizens, if not directly, then through their constituencies, and it is observed that Representatives, of whatever views, are exceedingly loath to lessen the protection of the special manufacturing industries of their districts. Moreover, the larger interests maintain powerful agencies at Washington to watch and work, so that a great tariff debate is merely a keen conflict between rival interests to secure their own advantage, rather than an attempt to provide for the payment of the expenses of the government by a tax wisely and equitably laid upon the whole body of citizens.

The advantage of the recent debate is that it has revealed this situation more clearly to the country. It is evident that there is no general principle of adjusting the tariff tax upon which its advocates are agreed. Thus the duty upon lumber is abolished one day and restored upon the next, and obviously the action is due to some kind of understanding or "log rolling" between various private interests, and is not determined by public considerations. The duty upon foreign books is stricken out, and that upon the material of book manufacture is retained. This is, of course, a discrimination against domestic industry. Good statesmanship, which is common-sense, would require that taxes under a tariff should not be laid in contravention of their declared purpose of favoring American industry. A glimmering of this truth was presently vouchsafed, and the tax upon the foreign manufactured product was restored in a modified form. The tariff also lays a tax upon foreign pictures, which is a foul blow at American art, because by no possibility can a tax upon the works of RAPHAEL tend to produce an American RAPHAEL, while, should such a RAPHAEL appear, the tariff, by excluding the master-works of his art, obstructs the development of his genius. The discussion also has undoubtedly helped to show more clearly to the general public that much of the money derived from the tariff tax is not devoted to payment of the public expenses, but only increases the profits of private enterprise.

This enlightenment has not prompted a public desire to deal rashly with great interests, or to sacrifice American industry to doubtful theories. But it has unquestionably shown the fallacy of many of the arguments upon which an inequitable system of taxation has been maintained. The first and chief argument for that system, which is by far its most powerful plea with the country, is that a change of principle in laying the tariff tax would expose the highly paid industry of America to an unaided competition with the ill-paid labor of Europe, in which the American workman would be reduced to the level of the foreign pauper. But this involves a discussion of the real conditions that determine wages, and the facts upon this point that have been elicited during the discussion have been very striking, and are widely pondered. If in many protected industries wages are lower than in unprotected industries, it is plain that other reasons than protection must be found for high wages. And if protection enhances prices, which is its necessary result, it reduces the purchasing power of wages. It can not at the same time raise wages and lower prices. These interesting details and statistics have arrested public attention, while the obvious fact that the tariff tax produces a large surplus in the Treasury which inevitably fosters extravagance and corruption, has led to a general demand for a reduction of the revenue. That this demand will be satisfied is not clear, and that if a change in the tariff tax should be made it would leave it a more inequitable impost than at present is not impossible. But whether any change should be made or not, and whatever the change might be, there is no doubt that the country has gained a clearer conception of the true principles of tariff taxation. Politically it would be a serious blunder for the Republicans who control Congress to adjourn without providing the relief which a Republican President has recommended. Party policy requires that the Republicans shall provide such relief, and throw upon the Democrats the responsibility of delay and opposition. But as the session ends it is becoming a question whether some system of graduated "horizontal" reduction of the revenue, by diminishing the rate of all duties by a specified rate per cent. annually, may not be adopted.

THE MEXICAN TREATY.

So little was known about the Mexican treaty, although it was alleged to effect radically certain great interests in this country, that Senator WINDOM did good service in procuring its publicity. A few facts may throw light upon some of the reasons and special objects of the treaty. The Southwestern system of railroads has Mexico as its objective point. But there is very little business to be done with Mexico unless some means of promoting trade can be found. If, now, a scheme for stimulating sugar-growing in Mexico could be put in operation, whoever controlled the railroads leading from the Mexican cane fields to the refineries of St Louis could repeat upon a larger scale the achievements of CLAUS SPRECKELS under the Hawaiian treaty. He buys his sugar in the Hawaiian islands, refines it in San Francisco, and sells it at the same price which is charged by other refiners who use only duty-paid sugar. The enormous profit between the prime cost and the sales price goes to the Hawaiian planters, of whom SPRECKELS himself is the chief. Those profits are made at the cost of the people to whom these sugars are sold at a profit of perhaps $5 per barrel, while a fair profit, such as our refiners realize, would be twenty or thirty cents per barrel.

There can be only one price for sugar in the United States, and that is the cost of importing the duty-paid sugars, which form the bulk of our supplies. All sugar, wherever produced, and whether it has paid duty or not, sells at the same price, quality considered. Thus Mexican sugar would sell at the same price as Louisiana sugar, and that sells at the same price as foreign sugar of equal quality, which pays two and a half cents per pound duty. That is to say, all buyers of sugar pay a price enhanced by two and a half cents, the present average rate of duty, which it is not proposed seriously to lower. The proposed Mexican treaty admits free of duty Mexican sugars of refining grades. This would give a bounty of from two to two and a half cents per pound to all Mexican sugar planters, which would yield a profit of fully fifty per cent. upon the cost of production. This would stimulate the production enormously, and to that extent diminish the revenue, for the benefit of Mexican planters.

The present high duty is maintained for the benefit of the Louisiana planters. On every barrel of refined sugar costing $20 the intrinsic value is $12, and the $8 represents the enhancement of cost by the tariff. The weight of this burden is suggested by Senator FRYE'S remark the other day that in some parts of the country the family expenditure for sugar is greater than that for flour. The Louisiana sugar-growers are fellow citizens, and share the common responsibilities and burdens of the government. But why should so heavy a tax upon a prime necessity be laid for the benefit of Mexicans? That is the question suggested by this provision of the treaty. It is true that the treaty has but six years to run, and that all commercial treaties must be considered with reference to average compensation. But there is no doubt that the Hawaiian planter reaps the whole benefit of the exemption of his sugar from duty, and the Mexican planter would enjoy the same advantage upon a much larger scale. It is a bounty paid to foreign producers at the expense of American consumers, which is certainly the least defensible kind of protection. But it is a kind that would be very agreeable to the lucky railroad which should control the traffic. The Senate has done wisely in publishing the treaty, which can now be fully and intelligently discussed.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

THE proper enforcement of the civil service reform act depends wholly upon the President, and there was very great and general interest to see what his course would be. The selection of the Commissioners was sure to show his feeling and purpose, and every sincere friend of reform perceives with the greatest pleasure that he has given the most conclusive evidence of his entire good faith. He has intrusted the supervision of the reformed system to its friends, and in so doing he has done what he can to assure the successful operation of the act.

It must be peculiarly gratifying to MR EATON that upon the passage of the bill, in the preparation of which he took so important a part, his name was universally and justinetively mentioned as that of the man especially fitted for the position of Commissioner. No man has greater knowledge of the subject, no one has devoted more thought to it, and he has the great advantage of a long and friendly acquaintance with the President, with whom he will be brought into close official connection.

His colleagues, MR GREGORY, of Illinois, and MR. THOMAS, of Ohio, the latter a personal and political friend of Senator PENDLETON, are both men of ability and distinction, and sincere friends of the reformed system. The President could have done nothing which would more closely commend him to the respect of the great body of intelligent American citizens than his action upon the subject of this reform, to which he was not believed to be especially friendly. His command of that respect will be complete, if the view of the special correspondent of the Herald shall prove to be correct. In announcing the nominations of the Commission the correspondent says:

"The plain meaning of these nominations is that the President puts the execution of the new law into the hands of its friends, with the strong desire that they shall make it successful. It is well known that he approves of the law, and it will be found that in important nominations hereafter to be made he will conform to the spirit of it, and give that aid and countenance to the labors of the Commissioners which will help them to its successful administration. He has the determination to do all in his power to separate the business of the government from mere partisan politics. Although he makes fewer professions than some of his predecessors, it is well known here that no President for many years has so constantly discouraged mere office seeking. Nor have any of his recent predecessors so carefully administered the government on business principles, dealing with the subordinate places to be filled from a business and not from a mere partisan stand point."

THE EDSON CHARTER.

ONE of the most difficult and harassing of political problems is to devise a government for the city of New York which shall be simple, efficient, economical, and satisfactory. There is probably no great and important nominally self-governing community in the world which has so little knowledge of its own government, and so little respect for it, as the city of New York. The general feeling of the most intelligent citizens is that no effort is of any use, and that the most reasonable and honest endeavor, like the Citizens' movement of last autumn, is sure to be baffled by the bargains of other intelligent citizens, who are also warm partisans, like the leading Democrats, who last November deliberately "made a deal" for the municipal government. The conduct of Mayor EDSON in making his appointments was universally condemned as a total surrender to Tammany Hall, which is the familiar head-quarters of city misrule, jobbery, and corruption. But, notwithstanding this, the Mayor has prepared a charter which is, upon the whole, and with certain modifications, the best charter which has been suggested for the actual situation in the city.

The vice of the city charters generally is a diffusion of responsibility until it is lost. This of course is the object of knaves in preparing such an instrument. The virtue of the EDSON charter is that it concentrates and defines responsibility. It gives the Mayor power to appoint the heads of departments, and to remove them under certain conditions. This is the central idea of the charter. It makes the Mayor a very powerful officer, and individually responsible to the citizens for the government of the city. It grants, in fact, an enormous power. But it is not for that reason to be opposed if it be properly guarded. The necessary restraint is not to be sought, however, in such a body as the Board of Aldermen, which in no just sense represents the people of New York. A decent and honorable man may sometimes be found in that body. But the wonder in regard to such an Alderman is that of King GEORGE about the apple and the dumpling—how came he to be elected? The history of municipal administration, when its executive agents are practically appointed by such a body, is notorious. But in the present situation when a Mayor is elected as the agent of a party for an administration of affairs into which party considerations do not naturally and can not properly enter, the result of absolutely unrestrained power would be to aggravate and extend every kind of party abuse; and as the Election Bureau, with all other municipal affairs, would be under his sole direction, and as the result of the election in the State often depends upon the returns in the city, it is of the highest public importance that every reasonable safeguard be provided against the possible abuse of the power.

This restraint is to be found in proper barriers against a partisan misuse of the power, and to this end the whole body of subordinates should be appointed solely upon proof of merit and fitness, and the heads of departments should be appointed only after due public notice of such intention, and removed only after similar notice and fair hearing. This is substantially what Mr. EATON suggested to the Legislative committee, and Professor DWIGHT proposed that the new powers should be intrusted only to a Mayor who should be elected after the adoption of the charter, and he thought also that there were some departments which should have more than one head. The EDSON charter, with proper modifications of the kind that we have mentioned, would be an admirable instrument; and as complete irresponsibility and partisan abuse run mad have been tried with disastrous results, it is now the part of wisdom to try a municipal system of concentrated and well-defined responsibility, and great but wisely restrained executive power.

DRAM DRINKING IN NEW YORK.

At a meeting of prominent citizens the other evening it was resolved to make another effort to lessen the public temptation to drunkenness in New York. The Temperance Society of the Episcopal Church has been very active in this movement, and Mr. R. GRAHAM gave some statistics at the meeting which are worthy of consideration.

In the city of New York there are 10,075 liquor stores, or one to every 125 inhabitants. Of all arrests made in the city, 63.06 per cent. are for drunkenness or for disorder produced by drunkenness. In one block in the Bowery, out of seventeen houses, there are eleven which are used as saloons, and fifteen of the eighteen members of the Board of Aldermen are in the liquor traffic. The meeting resolved to call a public meeting at Chickering Hall to urge a reduction in the number of liquor shops, and the enforcement of the law forbidding the sale of liquor to minors and drunkards.

It is only by such steady persistence in well-doing that the cause is advanced. Those whose reflection upon the subject is exhausted by the assertion that people will drink, and that you can't help it, misstate the fact, because there are many ways in which you can help it. The account of the result of permitting universal free drinking in Switzerland which we recently published shows conclusively how much may be done by judicious regulations to diminish excessive drunkenness. Those who assert that you can't make people virtuous by law also entirely mistake the enterprise on hand. It is not proposed to undertake that work, but, by making public drinking more difficult, to lessen its extent. If you can't make people virtuous by law, you can by law diminish the temptation to drunkenness the opportunity. This is the humane and perfectly feasible purpose which the meeting and the movement are intended to promote.

A PITIFUL CALAMITY.

There could be no more pitiful story than that of the catastrophe in the Fourth Street Roman Catholic parochial school, nor any guilt more obvious than that of the authorities, whoever they may be, who allowed seven hundred children to be daily entombed in such a trap as the school building, with its narrow and winding staircases, its passages scarcely a yard wide, and its flimsy, stair railing, proves to have been.

Among those appalling disorders by fire, which are fast becoming a national disgrace, this one is the most sorrowful because of the tender age of the victims. No tale so heart-rending has been told for many a day. It is a ghastly satire upon adults who undertake to direct the education of children that the children perish horribly from the want of the most obvious care in providing for their accommodation. Those who would stuff a crowd into a Black Hole are not fit to teach hygiene, and those who would neglect the plainest precautions on necessarily to imperil hundreds of young lives are not fit to have any care of children.

This terrible event should lead to a thorough inspection of all the public-school buildings, to make them really secure at any expense, and it should be made a criminal offense to build any school which is not a fire-proof building. Fire-escapes are of little use in any crowded building. It must be fire-proof.

THE SIGNAL OFFICE.

The letters printed in the Congressional Record by Mr. BELTZHOOVER in regard to the Weather Signal Office have naturally excited general attention. His speech substantially accuses General HAZEN of a misuse of funds appropriated for the service of the bureau by devoting them to procuring a factitious expression of public favor toward keeping the bureau under military control. General HAZEN, in reply, without a direct and specific denial, declared the charges to be due to the malevolence of a discharged employé, and he asked the Secretary of War to request a Congressional investigation. The Secretary very properly replied that the question raised by the charges was not the efficiency of the Signal Bureau, but the fidelity of certain officers of the army connected with the Bureau, and that that was a question for a military court of inquiry.

General HAZEN demurred, and renewed his request for a Senatorial investigation as the ground of a pending proposition to transfer the bureau to the Interior Department. To this the Secretary in an admirable letter rejoined that it would be unbecoming in any department to suggest to either House of Congress how to pursue its inquiries. But as the conduct of officers of the army was questioned, and as General HAZEN agreed that there must be an investigation, if General HAZEN himself did not demand a court of inquiry, the Secretary would advise the President to assemble one.

Neither in the letters published by Mr BELTZHOOVER nor in his correspondence with the Secretary of War does General HAZEN appear to advantage; and it will not be easy for him to show how money appropriated for the work of his bureau could be properly applied to pay the expenses of an agent to produce an apparent expression of public opinion.

THE LAND LEAGUE AND THE ASSASSINATIONS.

It is unjust to hold a country or a people responsible for the crimes of individuals, and although the London Times insinuates and a Tory lord implies that Mr. PARNELL and the Land League may have supplied the money for the assassination plot in Dublin, something more than shrugs and hints will be necessary to show that men like JUSTIN MCCARTHY and MICHAEL DAVITT connive at the most dastardly murder.

The tragedy of the foul crime in the Phœnix Park is not so much that a dozen or more brutish men should be found among Irishmen willing to commit a murder at once so atrocious and so useless, as that assassination should be deliberately organized in Ireland against the members of a British government which is honestly and conspicuously friendly to Ireland. Among all Englishmen, none have shown a more sympathetic and sincere desire to redress Irish injustice and distress than Mr. FORSTER, and Mr. FORSTER was designed to be the first victim for whom the knife of Irish assassination was sharpened. Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT have proved to a hundred ways their goodwill to the Irish people, and it is they and the Government of which they were members who have been most fiercely denounced as tyrannical and oppressive.

They have not, indeed, advocated absolute Irish independence. But if every Englishman is to be treated as a deadly enemy to Ireland who does not accept the policy of the Irish "irreconcilables," nothing but relentless civil war can ever settle the difference between the islands. The Land League, we are confident, can not be held responsible for the ghastly acts which the examination at Dublin has revealed. Yet the League and its orators have been too willing to make appeals and to point to conclusions which might be readily perverted by ignorant, passionate, and criminal adherents. O'CONNELL never permitted himself to be misunderstood. He was content to wage a peaceful agitation. He denounced any other kind. Young Ireland, on the other hand, meant war if necessary, and did not conceal its purpose. The Land League has lacked a masterful control, and it is inestimably discredited by crimes of which it was doubtless innocent. Hereafter when Irishmen living in the country are asked to give money, let them have self-respect enough to insist upon knowing for what purpose the money is given. It is shameful to think that American gifts may have promoted the wanton murders in the Phœnix Park.

GEORGE DAWSON.

With a great funeral, and with a great concourse of mourners who were not near Albany, GEORGE DAWSON was buried, and over the grave of his "newspaper team" could more general and hearty sorrow be breathed. He was a man of strong, sturdy, simple, and affectionate nature; of unwasted enthusiasms and cheerful faith; a warm-hearted, high minded, upright, and generous boy at seventy. A printer and editor and publisher, sagacious and faithful and efficient; a courageous and independent citizen; in his own Scotch word, a "canny" comrade; honest and most modest—he will be remembered not only with respect, but with affection, by those who saw him little, and who did not intimately know him, but who could not meet him without recognizing a genuine man.

PERSONAL.

The already magnificent picture-gallery of Mr WILLIAM H VANDERBILT, at Fifty-first Street and Fifth Avenue, is about to be enlarged by an addition, fifty five feet long and thirty four feet wide, which will take the place of the present aquarelle room. The wall spaces behind the pictures are to be covered with silk stuff in tapestry colors, and the frieze above them will show an arcade to correct and exotic woods. Directly behind the present gallery, and opening from it, a conservatory of iron, with walls of colored tiles, is to be erected, the dimensions being thirty six feet by twenty-two. When these improvements are completed, the visitor who stands in the bay-window of the drawing room on Fifth Avenue and looks thence across that room, across the hall, across the picture gallery, and across the conservatory, will have a superb view one hundred and fifty feet long.

—The late Professor AGASSIZ, of Princeton College, was a man of such commanding physical proportions as might have entitled him to membership in the Club of the Titans. He had the knack of keeping order in the class-room by impressing his students with a profound respect for his personalities as disciplinarian. One look out of his penetrating and unimpassioned eyes was sufficient to quell the first inclination to mischief on the part of the boys. His administrative capacity was the admiration of the business men among the trustees of the institution. Of late years he was often spoken of among the faculty as the probable successor of President MCCOSH.

—The readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be delighted to learn that a new serial story by their favorite author Mr JAMES OTIS is to begin in the next number of that paper, published March 6. The story is called "The Raising of the 'Pearl,'" and narrates the adventures of a party of boys who, under the supervision of a genial old sailor, succeed in pumping out and raising a steam-yacht that had been sunk off the coast of Florida, and afterward make a cruise in the recovered craft, meeting with thrilling adventures. It is finely illustrated by W P SNYDER.

—Mr JULIAN HAWTHORNE has nearly finished the conclusion to his novel, Fortune's Fool, for which the readers of an English magazine have been waiting. We understand that the novel in its complete form was sent in the manuscript and paid for before its first part had been published. But the author, having had a new idea with respect to the termination of the story, asked for the return of the last pages of his MS., and when he had received those proceeded to rewrite and multiply them. Unfortunately the new MS. never reached its destination, and Mr HAWTHORNE thinks that it must have been lost in the mails. As soon as he could overcome his disappointment and vexation he began for the third time the conclusion of the novel, which will be forwarded to London in a few days.

—Lieutenant-Commander GORRINGE, of the United States navy, has embarked in the business of building ships, after seventeen years' experience in commanding them. To have been only a lieutenant-commander for so long a time, as he declares, "not calculated to make an ambitious man contented with his lot."

—According to Mr T P O'CONNOR, M P., Parliament has a far greater proportion now than formerly of members whose only claim to political distinction is the possession of large wealth, so that the history of England offers another of the many instances in which the growth of democratic institutions has been accompanied by the retrogression of democratic principles.

—The Rev. Dr G H HEPWORTH, rector of the Church of the Transfiguration, better known as the "Little Church around the Corner," has long befriended the most unfortunate among his fellow-men. —The following telegram was sent from this city to Baireuth on the 17th of February: "To FRAU RICHARD WAGNER. The New York Philharmonic Society hereby expresses heart-felt condolence, and mourn a loss so irretrievable." It is one of very many of similar import from this side of the ocean.

He informed the restored monarch that, having come back with his hands clean, it was to be hoped that he would keep them so. The chief would probably insist on judging for himself of the condition of his sovereign's hands, and acting accordingly. It is manifestly impossible for an English government to put a Zulu chief on the throne and support him there, and yet let him govern according to the old barbarous methods.

At first it attracted only by the rare delicacy of its drawings, which represent with enravelled truth the exquisite tracery of vegetation, and the 'glem and grey' of Nature's shadows. A good example of this may be seen on the cover. But when we discovered that the artist is also the author, we began to read, and we found ourselves unable to stop till we got to the end. We feel that we have here, far more than in most American books, a genuine product of the soil."

—A colossal statue of bronze, nine feet high, will be erected in one of the public squares of Boston in honor of WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON. The work has been intrusted to Mr OLIN L. WARNER, of this city, who undoubtedly will give us something as fine in its way as the FARRAGUT statue by Mr ST GAUDENS.

—The burning of the old Havana steam-ship Morro Castle at Charleston, South Carolina, recalls her eventful voyage from Havana to New York in the winter of 1872, when she was under command of Captain THOMAS S. CURRIE, now of the Saratoga. A terrible storm, amounting almost to a cyclone, swept the ocean, and the staunch ship was tossed about like a cockle-shell on the tremendous seas. It was almost impossible for the passengers to keep in their berths, and many of the ladies were tied to the sofas in the main saloon as the only means of procuring them rest. To add to the terrors of the storm, the supply of coal began to run low, and Captain CURRIE resorted to the device of burning sugar to keep up the furnace fires. The passengers knew afterward that he had little hope of saving the ship, but during the storm he was always calm, self-possessed, and cheerful. On the fourth night of the storm the writer of this paragraph remembers that he came into the cabin about twelve o'clock, and announced that no one [illegible] hour the Highland lights would be visible. It seemed incredible that he should know this, for since the beginning of the storm he had [illegible] dead reckoning only. But at two o'clock a [illegible] on deck called up [illegible] one who was able to stand, and [illegible] the two lights, which none of us had [illegible] gleaming dimly through the storm. The [illegible] held [illegible] the name [illegible] good seamanship brought them safely home [illegible] voyage.

THE NEW YORK FANCIERS' CLUB SHOW.

A FAINT tapping could be heard as from the interior of one of a number of eggs that lay recently in one of the compartments of an artificial incubator in Madison Square Garden. The annual exhibition of the New York Fanciers' Club was in progress and the incubator was one of its chief attractions. An attendant who heard the call from the interior of the shell tapped on the exterior in response. A bit of the white shell fell away. A tiny yellow beak pushed its way through the opening, and was followed by a fuzzy ball of pale yellow mounted on two deeper yellow legs. The new-comer blinked at the strong light in the Garden, said "Good-morning" to a world of poultry shows and competition for prizes, cocked its head sanely, and looked with a mingled air of astonishment and disgust at the shell from which it had just emerged. With a spiteful little kick, the old home was discarded forever by the stripling, who then set itself to making the acquaintance of others of its kind, who had entered into this vale of tears after the same fashion. A half-hour later it was watching as curiously as were the throng of spectators about the incubator another chicken make its advent into the world. The actual conversion of egg into chicken was as great a curiosity to it as to the thousands who watched the process day after day during the continuance of the exhibition.

"Queer, isn't it? Raised for the market, I suppose," remarked a broker, who was an interested spectator. Every one turned to look at the chicks. The little fellows, too, stopped thinking eyes, seemed awe-stricken. Their anxiety was seemingly relieved when a fancier remarked: "Hardly, sir. They're from choice eggs. From hens with pedigrees as long as those of any of your racehorses. A year from now you may see those little fellows proudly occupying coops over [illegible] and competing for silver cups or money sweepstakes. When incubators first came into use they were used exclusively for raising chickens for the market, so as to give your New York epicures spring chickens and broilers all the year round. Fanciers have found it possible, however, to raise chickens by this artificial method just as strong, healthy children are raised on the bottle. It's a great invention; helps the farmer and fancier to make money more rapidly than they could otherwise. Besides, you see, it saves wear and tear on the hens. They don't have to waste their time sitting, and can keep at their legitimate business—laying eggs." The advocate of artificial breeding led the way to a coop of huge Cochins. As tenderly as his wife would handle her babe, he took from the coop a handsome cockerel. "Weighs twelve pounds, and is not quite a year old," he remarked. "Handsome, isn't he? Was marked 96 points out of a possible 100 by the judges, and has been rated even higher at former shows. He was raised in an incubator, and nursed by an artificial mother. I used to raise all my exhibition birds in the natural way; now I use the artificial method principally. The results seem to be as good in one way as in the other. That invention makes chicken raising with profit a possibility, and saves us a deal of trouble."

Had a wild cock and hen from India or Java, the progenitors of the domestic fowl, been introduced into the Garden last week, they would hardly have recognized their descendants in the improved or evoluted chicken. The cackle and crow would have had a somewhat familiar sound, but there the resemblance would have ceased. In character and plumage there would have been as wide a difference between the wild and the domestic fowl as between the Puritan fathers and their gay descendants who make Boston a fashionable as well as cultured city. The Puritan crops out in the honest farmer of Eastern Massachusetts, and the [illegible] of the Puritan chicken, so to speak, are represented in hundreds of [illegible] fancy breeds. True is [illegible] in miniature, the real [illegible] would be found to occupy a position between the two in size, and more modestly clothed with plumage. Could the parent birds of all domestic fowls think as they saw their descendants, ranging in size from the tiny strutting bantam of a pound weight to the huge Brahmin of fifteen pounds, they would at once, and unquestioningly, accept as true the theory of evolution. They would also be very proud that their descendants were such handsome creatures. The perfection of comb and wattle, the regularity and beauty of hackle, wing, and tail feathers, the graceful top-knots of the French and Polish breeds, the sweeping leg feathers of the Asiatics—all the results of interbreeding—would fill their hearts with as much pride as do the rich and showy costumes of a little one at a children's carnival the hearts of their parents. The disarranged and generally disorganized plumage of the frizzles, which seems to be determined to grow the wrong way, and the lack of tail feathers on the rumpless, would as certainly give rise to the New England cackle, "How shiftless!" as would the sight of the bantam the query, "Have we evoluted backward?"

The exhibition was a breeders' triumph. The perfection of desirable qualities in a fowl—[illegible] flesh, and egg-producing qualities [illegible] to have been attained in the Plymouth R[illegible] mans, Leghorns, and Spanish. Perfection [illegible] was reached in the crested Houdans and [illegible] games, and the snobbish bantams.

No less attractive than the poultry, and no less perfect from a breeder's stand-point, was the exhibition of pigeons. The pouter, with its balloon-like neck often expanded with air until the crop equals in size the body of the bird; the carrier, with its curiously wattled head and beak; the jacobin and its tuberance rivalled in size the body of the bird, the jacobin and nuns, with hoods of feathers; the fan-tail, with its never resting but always swaying head and neck and wreath of snowy white, fan-like tail feathers; the yet more restless tumbler, with its curious predilection for somersaults; and the fragile ring-dove, with ring of black set into the pure white or soft [illegible]-color of the neck plumage—combined to form, even in the setting of rough cages, a picture of unusual beauty.

Years of labor have been necessary to produce in their perfection the marked characteristics of each class of poultry and pigeons shown. Especially is this true of the pigeons where mating and matching to procure some abnormal growth is a work carried through a series of years, the mere thought of which would be sufficient to appall the novice who would undertake to produce like results, or equally successful ones in another direction. Is it a wonder, then, that rival fanciers, when interviewing judges, sometimes assume such a warlike aspect as that given by our artist to the birds themselves who are rival competitors for honors?

ENGLISH EPITAPHS.

In a cemetery near Windsor this verse of Holy Scripture appears on a head-stone beneath the name of a man who died, advanced in years:

Behold, I come as a thief.

Given thus without any context the first suggestion is that the deceased says to the passer-by, "Behold, I come as a thief." One requires some time and some thought fully to take in the object of this epitaph, if [illegible] may call it so, which is, doubtless, to act as a warning to those now living, as we may suppose it once acted to the dead man at our feet.

A Mr. Charles Lamb, not the Elia with whom and for whom we have laughed and wept, sleeps beneath an epitaph of which even the authors of the words of comic songs might be ashamed:

> Here lies the body of > poor Charles Lamb, > Killed by a tree that > fell slap bang.

Great grief was caused to an aged widow by the refusal of a clergyman to allow her to have inscribed the lines which her husband had written for himself:

> Here lies at rest from > [illegible] wars
> A [illegible] of the 4th
> Hussars;
> He [illegible] in nar> row borders,
> He[illegible] wait till further > orders.

Here is an inscription [illegible] the burying-ground of St. Peter's Church, near Broad-[illegible]:

> In memory of M. Rich'd
> Joy > called the Kentish Sam> son, > who died May [illegible] 1742,
> aged 67.
> [illegible] Hero, famed
> [illegible],
> [illegible] here his > [illegible] and length,
> [illegible] the mighty
> [illegible] is fallen!
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible] same judgement
> [illegible]
> [illegible] great as David
> [illegible]

Richard Joy is likened to Samson, Her[illegible] Goliath all [illegible] breath.

Who will not wonder at and admire the [illegible] of grandeur, of the genius whose [illegible] furnished him with [illegible] of putting into verse the [illegible] event which he has thus recorded?

> The wedding day ap> pointed was,
> The wedding clothes > provided;
> But ere the wedding > day arrived
> She sickened and she > died dead.

After this instance of a poet's ingenuity in overcoming the exigencies and difficulties of rhyme, it may be as well to point out how another genius did not overcome but evaded similar difficulties. The following [illegible] in Devonshire, and Devonshire men [illegible] indomitable energy and pluck:

> Here lies Lies Meadow
> Who passed away like a shadow.
> N.B. His name was Fleod, > but it would not rhyme.

A [illegible] epitaph—puzzling because either the lady was very thin [illegible] bung-hole unusually large—is the following:

> In memory of
> John Collins and Mary his wife
> She } died { May 1st 1791. } Ætatis { 76
> He } { Aug. 19th 1797. } { 79
> Also the children of John and Ann Collins
> George } born { Feb. 4th 1794. } died { [illegible] 1796
> Martha } { Sept. 27th 1801. } { [illegible] 1st 1809
> 'Twas as she tript from cask to cask
> In at a Bung-hole quickly fell
> Suffocation was her task
> She had no time to say farewell.
> Ann Collins died Sept. 11th 18[illegible] Ætatis 40.

NEW ORLEANS LEVEES.

THE broad levees which protect the city of New Orleans against the assaults of the Mississippi are crowded day and night by picturesque and motley throngs of people, representing every phase of sea-faring and river life. The scene is bewildering to a stranger; and our artist, who has endeavored to convey a pictorial idea of it, confesses that he was at a loss to know what to choose from the amazing variety of incidents and characters that passed in a constantly changing panorama before his eyes.

Even at night the levees present scenes of bustling activity. New Orleans is far ahead of most Northern cities in the use of the electric light. Even down back streets and narrow alleys are illuminated by its powerful rays, and it is not uncommon to find the brilliantly lighted glare of glass swinging in front of some picturesque tumble-down shop, which doesn't look as if its whole stock would be valued at more than a hundred dollars or two. As many portions of the city, especially the older streets, are wonderfully picturesque and quaint, the electric illumination produces effects which are nowhere else observable.

Along the levees the electric lights are suspended on poles from high poles, affording a broadly diffused light, by means of which the business of loading and unloading the ships, steamboats, and other craft is carried on with as much facility as by day. Some of the globes are variously colored, to designate different localities. Our artist made his sketch on a clear night, in order to show the busy scene to the best advantage, and renders an idea of the extent and variety of the work carried on after sunset along the river-front; but there are nights when the heavy sea fog comes sweeping up, like a great wall, shrouding all the shipping and enveloping the levees. The effect is then wonderful. Everything wears an uncertain, weird, and ghostly appearance. Doré would have revelled in these scenes, where he would have found subjects for his pencil as much classic grace and picturesque as in any of the older portions of Paris or London.

What her great dikes are to Holland the levee is to New Orleans. Without this cyclopean embankment, fifteen feet wide at the top and extending for ten hundred miles above and fifty below the city, her streets would be subject to inundation every spring. The author of "Hadibras" described Holland in humorous verse as "a country that drains fifty feet of water," where people "do not live but go on board." The description might have applied in some degree to the New Orleans of earlier years; but engineering skill and a judicious outlay of money, applied to the construction of the levee, and an extensive system of drainage, have made it one of the most healthful and pleasant cities of America.

Among the few features of agricultural England which retain an appearance but little modified by the lapse of centuries may be reckoned the high, grassy, and furzy downs, coombs, or cwellmes, as they are indifferently called, that fill a large area of certain counties in the south and southwest. If any much of human occupation is met with hereon, it usually takes the form of the solitary cottage of some shepherd.

Fifty years ago such a lonely cottage stood on such a down, and may possibly be standing there now. In spite of its loneliness, however, the spot, be actual measurement, was not more than five miles from a county town. Yet what of that? Five miles of irregular upland, during the long inimical seasons, with their sleets, snows, rains, and mists, afford withdrawing space enough to isolate a Timon and a Nebuchadnezzar: much less, in fair weather, to please that less repellent tribe, the poets, philosophers, artists, and others who "conceive and meditate of pleasant things."

Some old earthen camp or barrow, some clump of trees, at least some stunted fragment of ancient hedge, is usually taken advantage of in the erection of these forlorn dwellings. But in the present case such a kind of shelter had been disregarded. Higher Crowstairs, or the house was called, stood quite detached and unsheltered. The only reason for its precise situation seemed to be the crossing of two foot-paths to right angles hard by, which may have crossed there and thus for a good five hundred years. The house was thus exposed to the elements on all sides. But though the wind up here blew unmistakably when it did blow, and the rain hit hard whenever it fell, the various weathers of the winter season were not quite so formidable on the coomb as they were imagined to be by dwellers on low ground. The rain rimes were not so pernicious on its broad bosom, and the frosts were scarcely so severe. When the shepherd and his family who tenanted the house were pitied for their sufferings from the exposure, they said that upon the whole they were less inconvenienced by "wuzzes and flames" (hoarses and phlegms) than when they had lived by the stream of a snug neighboring valley.

The night of March 28, 182-, was precisely one of the nights that were wont annually forth those expressions of commiseration. The level rain-storm smote sable, sheer, and hedgeless like the cloth-yard shafts of Senlac and Crécy. Such sheep and out-door animals as had no shelter stood with their buttocks to the wind, while the tails of little birds trying to roost on some scraggy thorn were blown inside out like umbrellas. The gable end of the cottage was stained with wet, and the eaves-droppings flapped against the wall. Yet never was commemoration for the shepherd more misplaced. For that cheerful rustic was entertaining a large party in glorification of the christening of his second girl.

The guests had arrived before the rain began to fall, and they were all now assembled in the chief or living room of the dwelling. A glance into the apartment to eight o'clock on this eventful evening would have resulted in the opinion that it was as cozy and comfortable a nook as could be wished for in boisterous weather. The ceiling of its inhabitants was proclaimed by a number of highly polished sheep crooks without stems that were hung ornamentally over the fireplace, the curl of each shining crook varying from the corkscrew type engraved in the patriarchal pictures of old family Bibles to the most approved fashion of the last local sheep fair. The room was lighted by half a dozen candles, having wicks only a trifle smaller than the grease which enveloped them, in candlesticks that were never used but at high days, holidays, and family feasts. The lights were scattered about the room, two of them standing on the chimney piece. This position of candles was in itself significant. Candles on the chimney piece always meant a party.

On the hearth, in front of a back-brand to give substance, blazed a fire of thorns, that crackled "like the laughter of the fool."

Nineteen persons were gathered here. Of these, five women, wearing gowns of various bright hues, sat in chairs along the wall, girls shy and not shy filled the window-bench; four men, including Charley John, the hedge-carpenter, Elijah New, the parish clerk, and John Fitcher, a neighboring dairyman, the shepherd's father-in-law, lolled on the settle; a young man and maid, who were blushingly over tentative pourparlers on a life-companionship, sat beneath the corner cupboard; and an elderly engaged man of fifty or upward moved restlessly about from spots where his betrothed was not to the spot where she was. Enjoyment was pretty general, and so much the more prevailed in being unhampered by conventional restrictions. Absolute confidence in each other's good opinion kept perfect ease, while the finishing stroke of manner, amounting as a truly princely serenity, was lent to the majority by the absence of any expression or trait denoting that they wished to get on in the world, enlarge their minds, or do any eclipsing thing whatever — which nowadays so generally nips the blooms and bonhomie of all except the two extremes of the social scale.

Shepherd Fennel had married well, his wife being a dairyman's daughter from the valley below, who brought fifty guineas in her pocket—and kept them there, till they should be required for ministering to the needs of a coming family. This frugal woman had been somewhat unnerved as to the character that should be given to the gathering. A sit-still party had its advantages; but an undisturbed position of ease in chairs and settles was apt to lead on the men to much an unreasonable deal of toping that they ought sometimes fairly drink the house dry. A dancing party was the alternative; but this, while avoiding the foregoing objection on the score of good drink, had a counterbalancing disadvantage in the matter of good victuals, the ravenous appetites engendered by the exercise causing immense havoc in the butter. Shepherdess Fennel fell back upon the intermediate plan of mingling short dances with short periods of talk and song long, so as to hinder any ungovernable rage in either. But this scheme was entirely confined to her own gentle mind: the shepherd himself was in the mood to exhibit the most reckless phases of hospitality.

The fiddler was a boy of these parts, about twelve years of age, who had a wonderful dexterity in jigs and reels, though his fingers were as small and short as to necessitate a constant shifting for the high notes, from which he scrambled back to the first position with sounds not of unmixed purity of tone. At seven the shrill tweedle-dee of this youngster had begun, accompanied by a booming ground-bass from Elijah New, the parish clerk, who had thoughtfully brought with him his favorite musical instrument, the serpent. Dancing was fortantaneous. Mrs. Fennel privately rejoining the players on no account to let the dance exceed the length of a quarter of an hour.

But Elijah and the boy, in the excitement of their position, quite forgot the injunction. Morcover, Oliver Giles, a man of seventeen, one of the dancers, who was enamored of his partner, a fair girl of thirty-three rolling years, had recklessly handed a new crown piece to the musicians as a bribe to keep going as long as they had muscle and wind. Mrs. Fennel, seeing the steam begin to generate on the countenances of her guests, creased arm and touched the fiddler's elbow and put her hand on the serpent's mouth. But they took no notice, and fearing she might lose her character of genial hostess if she were to interfere too markedly, she retired and sat down in help-less. And so the dance whirred on with remorseless fury, the performers moving in their planet-like courses, direct and retrograde, from apogee to perigee, till the hand of the well hushed clock at the bottom of the room had travelled over the circumference of an hour.

While these cheerful events were in course of enactment within Fennel's pastoral dwelling, an incident having considerable bearing on the party had occurred in the gloomy night without. Mrs. Fennel's concern about the growing fierceness of the dance corresponded in point of time with the ascent of a human figure to the solitary hill of Higher Crowstairs from the direction of the distant town. This personage strode on through the rain without a pause, following the little-worn path which, further on in its course, skirted the shepherd's cottage.

It was nearly the time of full moon, and on this account, though the sky was lined with a uniform sheet of dripping cloud, ordinary objects out-of-doors were readily visible. The said wan light revealed the lonely pedestrian to be a man of supple frame; his gait suggested that he had scenes but passed the period of perfect and innocent agility, though not so far as to be otherwise than rapid of motion when occasion required. In point of fact he might have been about forty years of age. He appeared tall, but a recruiting sergeant, or other person accustomed to the judging of men's heights by the eye, would have discerned that this was chiefly owing to his gauntness, and that he was not more than five feet eight or nine.

Notwithstanding the regularity of his tread, there was a caution in it, as in that of one who mentally feels his way; and despite the fact that it was not a black coat nor a dark garment of any sort that he wore, there was something about him which suggested that he naturally belonged to the black-coated tribes of men. His clothes were of fustian, and his boots hobnailed, yet in his progress he showed not the mud-accustomed bearing of hobnailed and fustianed peasantry.

By the time that he had arrived abreast of the shepherd's premises the rain came down, or rather came along, with yet more determined violence. The outshirts of the little homestead partially broke the force of wind and rain, and this induced him to stand still. The most salient of the shepherd's domestic erections was an empty pig at the forward corner of his hedgeless garden, for in these latitudes the principle of making the homelier features of your establishment by a conventional frontage was unknown. The traveller's eye was attracted to this small building by the pallid shine of the wet slates that covered it. He turned aside, and, finding it empty, stood under the pent-roof for shelter.

While he stood, the boom of the serpent within and the lesser strains of the fiddler reached the spot as an accompaniment to the surging hiss of the flying rain on the sod, its louder batting on the cabbage leaves of the garden, on the eight or ten bee-hives just discernible by the path, and its dripping from the eaves into a row of beehets and pans that had been placed under the walls of the cottage. For at Higher Crowstairs, as at all such elevated domiciles, the grand difficulty of housekeeping was an insufficiency of water, and a casual rain-fall was utilized by turning out, on coleberts, every utensil that the house contained. Some queer stories might be told of the contrivances for economy in suds and dish waters that are absolutely necessitated in upland habitations during the droughts of summer. But at this season there were no such exigencies: a mere acquaintance of what the skies bestowed was sufficient for an abundant store.

At last the notes of the serpent ceased, and the house was silent. This cessation of activity aroused the solitary pedestrian from the reverie into which he had lapsed, and emerging from the shed with an apparently new intention, he walked up the path to the house door. Arrived here, his first act was to kneel down on a large stone beside the row of vessels, and to drink a copious draught from one of them. Having quenched his thirst, he rose and lifted his hand to knock, but paused with his arm upon the panel. Since the dark surface of the wood revealed absolutely nothing, it was evident that he must be mentally looking through the door, as if he wished to measure thereby all the possibilities that a house of this sort might include, and how they might bear upon the question of his entry.

In his indecision he turned and surveyed the scene around. Not a soul was anywhere visible. The garden path stretched downward from his feet, gleaming like the track of a snail, the roof of the little well (mostly dry), the well cover, the top rail of the garden gate, were varnished with the same dull liquid glaze, while far away in the vale a faint whiteness of more than usual extent showed that the rivers were high in the meads. Beyond all this winked a few blurred lamp-lights through the beating drops—lights that denoted the situation of the county town, from which he had appeared to come. The absence of all notes of life in that direction seemed to clinch his intentions, and he knocked at the door.

Within, a desultory chat had taken the place of movement and musical sound. The hedge-carpenter was suggesting a song to the company, which nobody just then was inclined to undertake, so that the hunch afforded a not unwelcome diversion.

"Walk in," said the shepherd, promptly.

The latch clicked upward, and out of the night our pedestrian appeared upon the door mat. The shepherd arose, snuffed two of the nearest candles, and turned to look at him.

Their light disclosed that the stranger was dark in complexion, and not unprepossessing as to feature. His hat, which for a moment he did not remove, hung low over his eyes, without concealing that they were large, open, and determined, moving with a flash rather than a glance round the room. He seemed pleased with the survey, and baring his shaggy head, arid, in a rich, deep voice, "The rain is so heavy, friends, that I crave leave to come in and rest awhile."

"To be sure, stranger," said the shepherd.

"And faith you've been lucky in choosing your time, for we are having a bit of a fling for a glad cause—though to be sure a man could hardly wish that glad cause to happen more than once a year."

"Nor less," spoke up a woman. "For 'tis best to get your family over and done with as soon as you can, so as to be all the earlier out of the fag o't."

"And what may be this glad cause?" asked the stranger.

"A birth and christening," told the shepherd.

The stranger hoped his host might not be made unhappy either by too many or too few of such episodes, and being invited by a gesture to pull at the mug, in readily acquiesced. His manner, which, before entering, had been an dubious, was now altogether that of a careless and candid man.

"Late to be traipsing athwart this coomb, hey?" said the engaged man of fifty.

"Late it is, master, or you say.—I'll take a seat in the chimney-corner, if you have nothing to urge against it, ma'am; for I am a little moist on the side that was next the rain."

Mrs. Shepherd Fennell assented, and made room for the self invited comer, who, having got completely inside the chimney-corner, stretched out his legs and pile arms with the expansiveness of a person quite at home.

"Yes, I am rather thin in the vamp," he said, freely, seeing that the eyes of the shepherd's wife fell upon his boots, "and I am not well fitted, either. I have had some rough times lately, and have been forced to pick up what I can get in the way of wearing, but I must find a suit better fit for working-days when I reach home."

"One of hereabouts?" the hearing.

"Not quite that—further up the country."

"I thought so. And so am I; and by your tongue you come from my neighborhood."

"But you would hardly have heard of me," he said, quickly. "My time would be long before yours, ma'am, you see."

This testimony to the youthfulness of his hostess had the effect of stopping her cross-examination.

"There is only one thing more wanted to make us happy," continued the new-comer, "and that is a little baccy, which I am sorry to say I am out of."

"I'll fill your pipe," said the shepherd.

"I must ask you to lend me a pipe likewise."

"A smoker, and no pipe about ye?"

"I have dropped it somewhere on the road."

The shepherd filled and handed him a new clay pipe, saying, or he did so, "Hand me your baccy-box: I'll fill that too, now I am about it."

The man went through the movement of search ing his pockets.

"Lost that too?" said his entertainer, with some surprise.

"I am afraid so," said the man, with some confusion. "Give it to me in a screw of paper." Lighting his pipe at the candle with a suction that drew the whole flame into the bowl, he resettled himself in the corner, and bent his looks upon the faint steam from his damp legs, as if he wished to say no more.

Meanwhile the general body of guests had been taking little notice of this visitor, by reason of an absorbing discussion in which they were engaged with the head about a tune for the next dance. The matter being settled, they were about to stand up, when an interruption came in the shape of another knock at the door.

At sound of the same the man in the chimney-corner took up the poker and began stirring the fire, as if doing it thoroughly were the one aim of his existence; and a second time the shepherd said, "Walk in." In a moment another man stood upon the straw-woven door mat. He too was a stranger.

This individual was one of a type radically different from the first. There was more of the commonplace in his manner, and a certain jovial cosmopolitanism sat upon his features. He was several years older than the first arrival, his hair being slightly frosted, his eyebrows bristly, and his whiskers cut back from his cheeks. His face was rather full and flabby, and yet it was not altogether a face without power. A few grog blossoms marked the neighborhood of his nose. He flung back his long drab great-coat, revealing that beneath it he wore a suit of cinder gray shade throughout, large heavy seals, of some metal or other that would take a polish, dangling from his fob or his only personal ornament. Shaking the water drops from his low-crowned glazed hat, he said, "I must ask for a few minutes' shelter, comrades, or I shall be wetted to my skin before I get to Casterbridge."

"Make yourself at home, master," said the shepherd, perhaps a trifle less heartily than on the first occasion. Not that Fennel had the least tinge of niggardliness in his composition, but the room was far from large, spare chairs were not numerous, and damp companions were not altogether comfortable at close quarters for the women and girls in their bright-colored gowns.

However, the second comer, after taking off his great-coat, and hanging his hat on a cell in one of the ceiling beams as if he had been specially invited to put it there, advanced and sat down at the table. This had been pushed so closely into the chimney-corner, to give all available room to the dancers, that its inner edge grazed the elbow of the man who had ensconced himself by the fire, and thus the two strangers were brought into close companionship. They nodded to each other by way of breaking the ice of unacquaintance, and the first stranger handed his neighbor the large mug—a huge vessel of brown ware, having its upper edge worn away like a threshold by the rub of whole generations of thirsty lips that had gone the way of all flesh, and bearing the following inscription burned upon its rotund side in yellow letters:

"Thrink ye on yer carin, I cum."

The other man, nothing loath, raised the mug to his lips, and drank on and on and on, till a curious biuerness overspread the countenance of the shepherd's wife, who had regarded with no little surprise the first stranger's free offer to the man and of what did not belong to him to dispense.

"I knew it!" said the lager to the shepherd, with much satisfaction. "When I walked up your garden afore coming in, and saw the hives all of a row, I says to myself, 'Where there's bees there's honey, and where there's honey there's mead.' For rarest of such a truly comfortable sort as this I really didn't expect to meet in my older days." He took yet another pull at the mug, till it assumed an ominous bottomless. "Glad you enjoy it," said the shepherd, warmly.

"It is goodish mead," assented Mrs. Fennel, with an absence of enthusiasm, which seemed to say that it was possible to buy pennan for one's cellar at too heavy a price. "It is trouble enough to make, and really I hardly think we shall make any more. For honey sells well, and we can make shift with a drop o' small mead and metheglin for common use from the comb-washings."

"Oh, but you'll never have the heart!" reproachfully cried the stranger in cinder-gray, after taking up the mug a third time and seeing a drop empty. "I love mead, when 'tis old like this, as I love to go to church o' Sundays, in to relieve the needy any day of the week."

"Ha! ha! ha!" said the man in the chimney-corner, who, in spite of the inattention indicated by the pipe of tobacco, could not or would not refrain from this slight testimony to his comrade's humor.

Now the old mead of those days, brewed of the purest first-year or maiden honey, four pounds to the gallon—with its due complement of whites of eggs, cinnamon, ginger cloves, mace, rosemary, yeast, and processes of working, bottling, and cellaring—tasted remarkably strong, but it did not taste so strong as it actually was. Hence, presently, the stranger in cinder-gray at the table, moved by its creeping influence, unbuttoned his waistcoat, threw himself back in his chair, spread his legs, and made his presence felt in various ways.

"Well, well, as I say," he resumed, "I am going to Casterbridge, and to Casterbridge I must go. I should have been almost there by this time, but the rain drove me into ye, and I'm not sorry for it."

"You don't live in Casterbridge?" said the shepherd.

"Not as yet, though I shortly mean to move there."

"Going to set up in trade, perhaps?"

"No, no," said the shepherd's wife. "It is easy to see that the gentleman is rich, and don't want to work at anything."

The cinder-gray stranger paused, as if to consider whether he would accept that definition of himself. He presently rejected it by answering "Rich is not quite the word for me, dame. I do work, and I must work. And even if I only get to Casterbridge by midnight, I must begin work there at eight to-morrow morning. Yes, hot or wet, blow or snow, famine or sword, my day's work to-morrow must be done."

"Poor man! Then, in spite o' seeming, you be worse off than we?" replied the shepherd's wife.

"'Tis the nature of my trade, mum and maidens. 'Tis the nature of my trade more than my poverty. . . . But really and truly I must up and off, or I shan't get a lodging in the town." However, the speakers did not move, and directly afterward, "There's time for one more draught of friendship before I go; and I'd perform is at once if the mug were not dry."

"Here's a mug o' small," said Mrs. Fennel. "Small, we call it, though to be sure 'tis only the first wash o' the combs."

"No," said the stranger, disdainfully. "I won't spoil your first blushes by partaking o' your second."

"Certainly not," broke in Fennel. "We don't increase and multiply every day, and I'll fill the mug again." He went away to the dark place under the stairs where the barrel stood. The shepherdess followed him.

"Who should you do this?" she said, reproachfully, as soon as they were alone. "He's emptied it once, though it held enough for ten people, and now he's not contented wi' the small, but must needs call the more o' the strong. And a stranger unbeknown to any of us. For my part I don't like the look o' the man at all."

"Tut, he's in the house, my honey; and 'tis a wet night, and a christening. Does it' what's a cup of mead more or less? there'll be plenty more next bee-burning."

"Very well—this time, then," she answered, looking wistfully at the barrel. "But what is the man's calling, and where is he one of, that he should come in and join us like this?"

"I don't know. I'll ask him again."

The catastrophe of having the mug drained dry at one pull by the stranger in cinder-gray was effectually guarded against this time by Mrs. Fennel. She poured out his allowance in a small cup, keeping the large one at a discreet distance from him. When he had tossed off his portion the shepherd renewed his inquiry about the stranger's occupation.

The latter did not immediately reply, and the man to the chimney-corner, with sudden demonstrativeness, said, "Anybody may know my trade—I'm a wheelwright."

"A very good trade for these parts," said the shepherd.

"And anybody may know mine—if they've the sense to find it out," said the stranger in cinder-gray.

"You may generally tell what a man is by his claws," observed the hedge-carpenter, looking at his hands. "My fingers be as full of thorns as an old pincushion is of pins."

The hands of the man in the chimney-corner instinctively sought the shade, and he gazed into the fire as he resumed his pipe. The man at the table took up the hedge-carpenter's remark, and added, smartly, "True; but the oddity of my trade is that instead of setting a mark upon me, it sees a mark upon my customers."

No observation being offered he anybody in elucidation of this enigma, the shepherd's wife once more called for a song. The same obstacles presented themselves as at the former time—one had an take, another had forgotten the first verse. The stranger at the table, whose soul had now risen as a good working temperature, relieved the difficulty by exclaiming that, to start the company, he would sing himself. Thrusting one thumb into the armhole of his waistcoat, he waved the other hand in the air, and with an extemporizing gaze at the shining sheep crooks above the mantel-piece, began:

"Oh, my trade it is the rarest one,
Simple shepherds all—
My trade is a sight to see;
For my customers I lie, and take them up on high,
And wait 'em as a fair countree."

The room was silent when he had finished the verse—with one exception, that of the man in the chimney-corner, who, at the singer's word "Chorus," joined him in a deep bass voice of unusual relish

"And wait 'em to a fair countree."

Oliver Giles, John Pitcher the dairyman, the parish clerk, the engaged man of fifty, the row of young women against the wall, seemed lost in thought, not of the gayest kind. The shepherd looked meditatively on the ground, the shepherdess gazed keenly at the singer, and with some suspicion. She was doubting whether this stranger were merely singing an old song from recollection, as was composing one there and then for the occasion. All were as perplexed at the obscure revelation as the guests at Belshazzar's feast, except the man in the chimney-corner, who quietly said, "Second verse, stranger," and smoked on.

The singer thoroughly ministered himself from his lips aroused, and went on with the next stanza, as requested:

"My tools are but ransom sum,
Simple shepherds all;
My tools are no sight to see:
A little hempen string and a post thereon to swing
Are implements enough for me."

Shepherd Fennel glanced round. There was no longer any doubt that the stranger was unwilling his question rhythmically. The guests rose and all started back with suppressed excitation. The young woman engaged to the man of fifty fainted half way, and would have proceeded but finding him wanting in alacrity for catching her, she sat down, trembling.

"Oh, he's the ——!" whispered the people to the tall aground, mentioning the name of an ominous public officer. "He's come to do it. 'Tis he at Casterbridge jail to-morrow—the man for sheep-stealing—the poor clerk number we heard of, who used to live away at Anglebury, and had on work to do—Timothy Summers, whose family were a-starving, and as he went out of Anglebury by the high road and took a sheep in open daylight, defying the farmer and the farmer's wife and the farmer's man, and every man jack among 'em. He" (and they nodded toward the stranger of the terrible trade) "is come from up the country to do it because there's not enough to do in his own county town, and he's got the place here and one or two more's dead, he a-going to live in the same cottage under the prison wall."

The stranger in cinder-gray took no notice of this whispered string of observations, but again wetted his lips. Seeing that his friend in the chimney-corner was the only man who recipiented his joviality in any way, he held out his cup toward that appreciative comrade, who also held out his own. They clinked together, the ease of the rest of the room hanging upon the singer's actions. He parted his lips for the third verse, but at that moment another knock was audible upon the door.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

BY PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

II.

THAT A FREE MAN IS A SOVEREIGN, BUT THAT A SOVEREIGN CAN NOT TAKE "TIPS."

A FREE man, a free country, liberty, and equality are terms of constant use amongst us. They are employed as watch-words as soon as any social questions come into discussion. It is right that they should be so used. They ought to contain the broadest convictions and most positive faiths of the nation, and so they ought to be available for the decision of questions of detail. In order, however, that they may be so employed successfully and correctly, it is essential that the terms should be correctly defined, and that their popular use should conform to correct definitions. No doubt it is generally believed that the terms are easily understood, and present no difficulty. Probably the popular notion is that liberty means doing as one has a mind to, and that it is a metaphysical or sentimental goal. A little observation shows that there is as such thing in this world as doing as one has a mind to. There is no man, from the tramp up to the President, the Pope, or the Czar, who can do as he has a mind to. There never has been any man, from the primitive barbarian up to a Humboldt or a Darwin, who could do as he had a mind to. The "Bohemian" who determines to realize some sort of liberty of this kind accomplishes his purpose only by sacrificing most of the rights and owning his back as most of the duties of a civilized man, while filching as much as he can of the advantages of living in a civilized state. Moreover, liberty is not a metaphysical or sentimental thing at all. It is positive, practical, and actual. It is produced and maintained by law and institutions, and is therefore concrete and historical. Sometimes we speak distinctively of civil liberty, but if there be any liberty other than civil liberty—that is, liberty under law—it is a mere fiction of the schoolmen which they may be left to discuss.

Even as I write, however, I find in a leading review the following definition of liberty: civil liberty is "the result of the restraint exercised by the sovereign people on the more powerful individuals and classes of the community, prevenling them from availing themselves of the excess of their power to the detriment of the other classes." This definition lays the foundation for the result which it is apparently desired to reach, that "a government by the people can in no case become a paternal government, since its lawmakers are its roundabouts and servants carrying out its will, and not its fathers as its masters." Here we have the most mischievous fallacy under the general topic which I am discussing distinctly formulated. In the definition of liberty it will be noticed that liberty is construed as the act of the sovereign people against somebody, the most, of course, be differentiated from the sovereign people. Whenever "people" is used in this sense for anything less than the total population, man, woman, child, and baby, and whenever the great dogmas which remain the word people are construed under the limited definition of people, there is always fallacy. History is only a tiresome repetition of one story. Persons and classes have sought to win possession of the power of the state in order to live luxuriously out of the earnings of others. Aristocracies, aristocracies, theocracies, and all other organizations for holding political power have exhibited only the same line of action. It is the extreme of political error to say that if political power is only taken away from generals, nobles, priests, millionaires, and scholars, and given to artisans and peasants, these latter may be trusted to do only right and justice, and never to abuse the power, that they will repress all excess as others and control none themselves. They will commit abuse, if they can and dare, just as others have done. The reason for the excesses of old governing classes lies in the vices and passions of human nature, especially, covetousness, ambition, and vanity. These vices are confined to no nation, class, or age. They appear in the church the academy, the workshop, and the hovel, as well as on the army or the palace. They have appeared in aristocracies, theocracies, democracies, and republics, and all alike. The only thing which has ever restrained these vices of human nature in those who had political power is law sustained by impersonal institutions. If political power be given to the masses who have not inherited it, nothing will keep them from abusing it but laws and institutions. To say that a popular government can not be paternal is to give it a charter that it can do no wrong. The trouble is that a democratic government is in greater danger than any other of becoming paternal—step-paternal, —for it is sure of itself, and ready to undertake anything, and its power is excessive and pathos against dissentients.

What history shows is that rights are safe only when guaranteed against all arbitrary power and all base and personal [illegible]. The notion of a free state is entirely [illegible]. It has been developed with the development of the middle class, and with the growth of a commercial and industrial civilization. Slavery as common sentiment in a civilized state. The idea of the "free man," as we understand it, is the product of a revolt against mediæval and feudal ideas, and our notion of equality, when it is true and practical, can be explained only by that revolt. It was in England that the modern idea found birth. It has been strengthened by the industrial and commercial development of that country. It has been inherited by all the English speaking nations, who have made liberty real because they have inherited it, not as a notion, but as a body of institutions. It has been borrowed and imitated by the military and police states of the European continent so fast as they have felt the influence of the expanding industrial civilization, but they have realized it only imperfectly, because they have no body of local institutions or traditions, and it remains for them a matter of "declarations" and pronunciamentos. The notion of civil liberty which we have inherited is that of a status organized for the individual by laws and institutions, the effect of which is that each man is guaranteed the use of all his own powers exclusively for his own welfare. It is not at all a matter of election, a universal suffrage, as democracy. All institutions are to be tested by the degree to which they guarantee liberty. It is not to be admitted for a moment that liberty is a means to social ends, and that it may be impaired for major considerations. Any one who so argues has lost the bearing and relation of all the facts and factors in a free state. A human being has a life to live, a career to run. He is a centre of powers to work and of capacities to suffer. What he possesses may be, what he can carry him far as not, what his chances may be, whether wide or restricted; what his fortune may be, whether to suffer much or little—are questions of his personal destiny which he must work out and endure as he can, but for all that concerns the bearing of the society and its institutions upon that man, and upon the sum of happiness to which he can attain during his life on earth, the product of all history and all philosophy up to this time is summed up as the doctrine that he should be left free to do the most for himself that he can, and should be guaranteed the exclusive enjoyment of all that he does. If the society—that is to say, in plain terms, if his fellow men, either individually, by groups, as in a mass—impinge upon him otherwise than to surround him with normal conditions of security, they must do so under the strictest responsibility to justify themselves. Jealousy and prejudice against all such interferences are high political virtues in a free man. Liberty for labor and security for earnings are the ends for which civil institutions exist, not means which are to be employed for ulterior ends.

Now the cardinal doctrine of any sound political system is that rights and duties should be as equilibrium. A monarchical as aristocratic system is not immoral if the rights and duties of persons and classes are in equilibrium, although the rights and duties of different persons and classes are unequal. An immoral political system is created whenever there are privileged classes, that is, classes who have arrogated to themselves rights while throwing the duties upon others. In a democracy all have equal political rights. That is the fundamental political principle. A democracy, then, becomes immoral if all have not equal political duties. This is unquestionably the doctrine which needs to be reiterated and inculcated beyond all others if the democracy is to be made sound and permanent. Our orators and writers never speak of it, and do not seem often as know anything about it, but the real danger of democracy is that the classes which have the power under it will assume all the rights and reject all the duties, that is, that they will use the political power to plunder those who have. Democracy, in order to be true to itself, and to develop into a sound working system, must oppose the same cold resistance to any claims for favor on the ground of purity as on the ground of birth and rank. It can no more admit to public discussion, as within the range of possible action, any schemes for coddling and helping wage-receivers than it could entertain schemes for restricting political power to wage-payers. It must put down schemes for making "the rich" pay for character "the poor" want, just as it tramples on the old theories that aids the rich are fit to regulate society. The needs but to watch our periodical literature to see the danger that democracy will to constituted as a system of favoring a new privileged class of the many and the poor.

Holding in mind, now, the notions of liberty and democracy as we have defined them, we see that it is not altogether a matter of fanfaronade when the American citizen calls himself a "sovereign." A member of a free democracy is, in a sense, a sovereign. He has no superior. He has reached his sovereignty, however, by a process of reduction and division of power which leaves him no inferior. It is very grand to call one's self a sovereign, but it is greatly to the purpose to notice that the political responsibilities of the free man have been intensified and aggregated just in proportion as political rights have been reduced and divided. Many mistakes have been and possible of sovereignty and unfit for it. Placed in related situations, and inheritors of grand opportunities, they have only exhibited their own imbecility and vice. The reason was because they thought only of the gratification of their own vanity and not at all of their duty. The free man who steps forward to claim his inheritance and endowment as a free and equal member of a great civil body must understand that his duties and responsibilities are measured as him by the same scale as his rights and his powers. He wants to be subject to no man. He wants to be equal to his fellows, as all sovereigns are equal. So be it, but he can not escape the [illegible] that he can call on man to his aid. The other sovereigns will not respect his independence if he becomes dependent, and they one not respect his equality if he uses his favors. The free man in a free democracy, when he set off all the ties which might put him down, severed also all the ties by which he might have made others pull him up. He must take all the consequences of his new status. He is, in a certain sense, an isolated man. The family tie does not bring to him disgrace for the misdeeds of his relative as of once would have done, but neither does it furnish him with the support which it once would have given. The relations of men are open and free, but they are also loose. A free man in a free democracy derogates from his rank if he takes a favor for which he does not render an equivalent.

A free man in a free democracy has on duty whatever toward other men of the same rank and standing, except respect, courteer, and goodwill. We can not say that there are no classes when we are speaking politically, and then say that there are classes when we are telling A what it is his duty to do for B. So a free state every man is held and expected to take care of himself and his family, to make no tumble for his neighbor, and as contribute his full share to public interests and common necessities. If he fails in this, he throws burdens on others. He does not thereby acquire rights against the others. On the contrary, he only accumulates obligations toward them, and if he is allowed to make his deficiences a ground of new claims, he passes over into the position of a privileged or petted person—emancipated from duties, endowed with rights. This is the inevitable result of combining democratic political theories with humanitarian social theories. It would be made from my present purpose to show, but is is worth noticing in passing, that one result of such inconsistency must surely be to undermine democracy, to increase the power of capital in the democracy, and to hasten the subjection of democracy as plutocracy, for a man who accepts any share which he has not earned in another man's capital can not be an independent citizen.

THE WESTERN FLOODS.

THE subsidence of the great flood in the Ohio River leaves behind it scenes of terrible devastation and distress. Although relieved of the awful dangers that threatened while the waters were at their highest, the unfortunate people whose homes have been swept away, whose business has been ruined, are left in a state of pitiable destitution, and prompt and efficient measures are necessary to prevent wide-spread suffering among them. Americans have never been backward in giving where appeals have been made to their generosity, either from home or abroad, and in the case they are responding liberally to the cry of distress that comes from the banks of the Ohio.

Our illustrations give a vivid picture of the extent of the calamities which have befallen the people of that region. One of the most frightful incidents was the breaking of the embankment at Louisville, by which nearly a square mile of territory within the city limits was flooded. There was a slight break in the embankment on Monday, February 12, but it was speedily repaired, and in spite of the warning the inhabitants of the low grounds refused to leave their dwellings, and most of them went to bed as if no danger were impending. About midnight their slumbers were suddenly disturbed by a rush of roaring water. The embankment had given way, and in a moment the turbid flood was sweeping through the streets. The panic was indescribable. The roar of the waters could not drown the cries and shrieks of the terrified women and children as they endeavored to make their escape from the tottering buildings. Some succeeded in wading to higher ground, on which boatmen were quickly kindled as beacon lights to guide the unfortunates. Others were rescued in boats propelled by strong and resolute men. Many of the unfortunates saved nothing but their night clothing, happy as save their lives, and leaving all their household goods to be swept away. As most of the houses were small cottages of frail construction, they were quickly overturned as torn to pieces. Several of these dwellings were crushed before the inmates could escape. In some cases sick people were taken through the windows, and carried to a place of safety in boats, and several people were rescued from trees into which they had climbed. Many pathetic incidents took place while the brave rescuers were at work, at the risk of their own lives. We are told of cottages over whelmed in the darkness, with all their inmates, when help was just at hand, of homeless families shivering about the hearths. Two drunken men were saved with the greatest difficulty, as they could not be made to comprehend their danger, and were almost unmanageable. One little girl refused to leave her home until she had found her pet kitten. An old negro, half frozen and [illegible] saved, was found shivering on the top of a coal heap, guarding a wretched little ashbin.

Great difficulty was experienced in some cases in persuading some people to abandon their household goods. They would insist on loading the boats that came to their rescue with bedding and furniture, and in some instances could only be restrained by force from doing so. One poor old man cried as if his heart would break because he was not allowed to bind the best arm-chair with some cane-bottomed chairs which were the pride of his heart.

APPROACHING THE TRUTH.

CHAPTER XIX.

PANTING.

It was a grim scene, despite the afternoon sun still shining in the room. It verged closely upon tragedy; the tall figure of the farmer, with his clear gray eyes fixed upon his favorite pupil, Greg standing unmoved, and with his gaze directed toward the woman in the bed, who had brought this awful charge against him in her dying hours; and the woman staring back at him, judge and accuser in one, and with no scrap of belief in the innocence of him whom she accused.

"Is that true?" John Woodhatch had asked, as if he had not the slightest credence to his story; and Greg Dorward answered, without a quaver in his voice,

"It is not true!"

It was remarkable, there was no response in any way to his denial of the crime, only a solemn silence more embarrassing, more awful, than any comment which at that time might have been made, or any loud-voiced disbelief of his assertion. They were both looking at him—that was all. The eyes of Hester Brake were difficult to confront for long; he looked away at last, turning to John Woodhatch, as it were, for an explanation.

"Who charges me?" he asked; "what has suggested such an accusation?"

"She has known it for some time, she says, Greg."

"Is it possible you can think so, madam?" he asked, turning to Miss Brake again. "Have you considered the terrible position in which you place me? When your brother died I was a lad. I had been here only a day or two. I scarcely knew your brother."

"But you killed him!"

He turned once more to John Woodhatch and raised his shoulders slightly, as a Frenchman might have done.

"Can I reason with her, sir?" he said in a low voice; "is it worth while, poor lady, now?"

"Hardly."

The answer came in a deep, sonorous voice; there was no ring of sympathy in it, no touch of feeling for Greg Dorward's position, accused of murder as he was by one sick and half distraught, whose life had been a series of suspicions of her kind, and was dying out in the same miserable manner. Greg was surprised; he had looked for help, for confidence, from the master, out for want of faith so soon.

"Miss Brake has been led away by some wild tale to-day. Who is my accuser?" he asked, "who has had a word to say against me, and hides behind as weak a woman as this?"

He spoke almost contemptuously of the frail figure at which he gazed again, and John Woodhatch answered for her

"Spikins told her," he said.

"And was Spikins a man to be believed? What did he know of me?"

"He was a man who had much to say about Morris Brake at the last," was John Woodhatch's reply

"I would not have taken his word against the life of a sparrow," answered Greg.

"Neither would I," replied the farmer

"I knew you would not," exclaimed Greg

"Without proof," added John Woodhatch

"He has an proof of my connection with so horrible a deed; it is monstrous to consider it likely," Greg exclaimed, with new fervor.

Still John Woodhatch did not appear to be moved by Greg's declamation, although he did not betray in any way, unless by his grave, almost stoical demeanor, any actual doubt of Greg. He was in the chamber of the dying, and might think it better to moderate his words and looks in the presence of one slowly passing away from the world. But he might have convinced her by a little effort, thought Greg, of the improbability of the whole story, and of the indifferent character of him who had invented it.

"Tell him all," said the faint voice of Hester Brake.

"Not here; not now," answered John Woodhatch. "It is too late to speak of it before you."

"He says he did not kill my brother," she murmured. "If, after all, I should have been deceived, John?"

"Then he will forgive you, I am sure. But I could be glad to hear you say, Hester, at the last," he answered, "that if he were even guilty I could forgive him. He was only a boy he might have been a reason for it all; it might not have been even murder, judged by human error or temptation. Who knows but it of and this poor fellow here?"

His hand hand rested heavily on Greg Dorward's shoulder—so heavily that Greg shrank a from it in his first surprise.

Let h— —ll — the —," she murmured, and I — — — —."

I have nothing to — answered Greg; "I murder your brother, I swear by the liv-the solemn silence which had as the beginning of the interview with

I — in Harper's Weekly for 1866.

John Woodhatch spoke at last.

"That will do, Greg," he said. "Later on in the night we will talk of this again; you and I together."

"Very well. But—"

"But the suffering woman must depart in peace," he said. "The end is near, and time is precious with her."

John Woodhatch pointed to the door, and Greg Dorward bowed his head and walked slowly toward it. It had been a brief, strange interview, by which he had not profited—by which he was even bewildered. What did they know, what did they think they knew, to look at him with those great glassy eyes in which no love for him, no hope for him, seemed for one instant to dwell? It was impossible they could say one word to tarnish the good name which he, by dint of honest perseverance, had earned at Skegs Shore. It was all a mistake.

As the door closed on him Hester Brake looked toward John Woodhatch.

"So the miserable story ends, Hester," he said. "Let us not speak of it again."

"But—"

"You promised me."

"Ah, well, I leave it in your hands," answered Hester, "knowing I can trust you."

"Leaving me twice as I please?" he asked.

"As you please—yes."

"I will do my best."

"Good friend. You always did—you always will," she murmured.

"Oh, I will not say as much as that. It is a long distance to the end of a man's promise, and I am not a hero," he said, mordlie.

"You will be always strong and just," she said, with a sigh; "I am very sure of that. Where is Lucy Brake?"

"Do you wish to see her?" John Woodhatch inquired.

"Yes."

"I will fetch her to you."

"Think you," she replied, "I should like to see her for a little while. Not for long."

"No."

"And you will come back soon? You see one going to stop away from one at the last?" she said, half-fretfully.

"I will return when you wish, Hester."

"In half an hour, then."

When he was at the door he paused again.

"You will not distress Lucy, as yourself, by further talk concerning Morris," he said.

"Have I not said I leave the rest in your hands?"

"Yes."

"Trust me for a little while longer, John," she remarked. "If will out distress this Lucy of whom you think so much."

"She is a weak and excitable little woman," answered John. "Poor Lucy, it will be no much fresh concern for her when the time comes to tell her the truth."

"After all, the decision is with her. Morris was her love more than mine. She will think it justice her husband's murder should be avenged."

"I am no avenger," muttered John Woodhatch; "and," he added, "I have not said I believe this story."

"The guards are with you."

"They will be before the night closes."

"Ah! before the night closes," repeated Hester Brake.

John Woodhatch withdrew, and presently Lucy stole into the room and took her place at the bedside. But Hester Brake was not conscious of her sister-in-law's presence, she had fallen asleep the instant after John Woodhatch had quitted her, and though the sleep was restless and spasmodic, Lucy decided on not awakening her. It was better the sick — should rest, she thought. Hester Brake opened her eyes some twenty minutes later, and regarded, almost with surprise, the young woman by her bedside. She had forgotten she had sent for her, she only remembered that one old friend was missing from the room.

"Where is John?" she asked, in a voice that was very weak now.

"He is down-stairs. You sent for me, he said."

"Kitty Vanch, is it?"

"No, Lucy. I am Lucy; don't you know me?" asked the widow, bending more closely to her.

"Ah, yes! We haven't loved each other very much, have we?"

"We have not understood each other, that was all," was the reply

"If I have been unjust to you in any way, I am very sorry."

"Pray do not think of me; I was not just myself."

"You will think of John Woodhatch presently. And love him if you can. And tell him, some long day hence, Lucy," she murmured, "that I—have loved him—all my wasted life, and he never, never thought of me!"

She closed her eyes with a heavy sigh, as though she were tired out, and would sleep again before Jonn Woodhatch returned, and Lucy did not attempt to continue the conversation. There was a dread upon her even that Hester Brake might seek to bind her by some promise at the last, and ill might come of that. She would be glad when John Woodhatch returned to take his post here, as he had done for some mysterious — all the day; she was afraid of Hester Brake, and of all that might ensue before the parting hour.

But the hour had come already, and the parting had taken place between them. This poor, frail life—wasted as had not been, for all Hester's sorrow over its fancied uselessness—had glided quietly and painlessly away, and — did not — for her — — great — — — she — again, and saw God's soul upon the within, still face.

CHAPTER XX.

THE NIGHT WALK.

Over the grief at Farm Forlorn caused by the passing away of Hester Brake from the cares and troubles of daily life we can afford to draw the veil. It is enough to state that there was real sorrow in the house of mourning, and many weeping for the loss of her. The strange woman had never secured much love for herself; only one had ever professed to love her, or to be grateful for her guidance, and almost against her will she had brought discord into the lives of those by whom she had been surrounded. She had meant all for the best; she had despised hypocrisy, and set herself to baffle it; she had been irritable, suspicious, jealous, and eccentric by turns, but there were many in Farm Forlorn who heard of her decease with wet eyes and quivering lips.

Kitty was in the dead woman's room, inconsolable.

"I have lost the one friend I ever had," she cried, and Mrs. Chadderton leaned over her and attempted solace vainly.

"God will send you another friend," said Mrs. Chadderton; "you must not grieve like this for her."

"If I had only seen her at the last! If they had not sent me from her! If I might have told her she was wrong in all her thoughts of Greg!" moaned Kitty to herself. "If I could have seen her once more! if she had only lived another day!"

Greg Dorward's thoughts were very different from these

"If she had only died twenty-four hours earlier," said Greg, moodily, to John Woodhatch, when the news was brought to him that Hester Brake was dead, "it would have been as much the better."

"For you, or her?"

"For both of us," was the reply. "I should have esteemed her more, and she would not have raked up a terrible story, and connected me with it in this fashion."

"Shall we speak of it now?" asked Woodhatch, calmly

"Yes, surely," was the quick reply

"Let us get out of the house," said the farmer; "there are too many listeners here. And time is precious to you."

Greg looked at his master, but said nothing. He was suspected, then, in earnest: this was no delusion, no wild dream of a wild woman. Even John Woodhatch believed what Hester Brake had told him. And yet how often had he spoken disparagingly of her manner and ideas, setting down the trouble in his house at times, the difference between his friends, to her interference. He did not seem to think of that, or as regard Hester Brake in any way save that of one whose word was an infallibility.

They passed out of the farm house together; it was dark night, with the sky soon thick with stars. John Woodhatch looked up at them for a moment, as if marvelling at their beauty, and then master and pupil were on the high road together.

At a short distance from the farm there was a figure waiting for them—a shadow, ominous figure, who, it was evident, was expecting them to come that way.

"Who is this?" asked Greg, suspiciously.

"It is Reuben Fladge," answered John Woodhatch, "the boy been waiting for me."

It was on Greg's lips to ask a second question, but for some unaccountable reason he refrained. It was as well not to appear too curious or too suspicious.

Reuben Fladge clutched toward them, with his head bent down, and his hands thrust to the bottoms of his pockets. The news had reached him too of Miss Brake's death

"Got also a — — —," he said, when they were all three together on the high road

"Yes, Fladge, she is gone."

"She was a friend to me. And," he added, "I am awful sorry. It's one good in gone, isn't it Mr. Woodhatch?"

"It is."

"And the good are precious scarce," said Fladge, quite philosophically, "a dozen as two like me might go, and nobody the wuss for the matter. But one like her is missed."

"Yes, Fladge, the good are precious scarce," repeated John Woodhatch, tenderly.

"When's the funeral?"

"The funeral?"

"It'll be a fine 'un, I hope," said Fladge. "There should be a rare turn-out over her—be she?—if I had anything to do with it."

"She is not in her coffin yet," answered the master, moodily, "and we are not in a hurry to think of her grave."

They walked on slowly for a few paces, side by side, Greg Dorward, the man under suspicion, wondering at the other two. Suddenly John Woodhatch stopped again, and Greg stopped with him, Fladge plodding slowly in advance.

"Greg," said Woodhatch, "you say it is all false, and you have been wrongfully accused?"

"I do."

They went on again. When they had overtaken Fladge, John Woodhatch said to him,

"Do you remember my instructions?"

"Every word on 'em, master; to be sure."

"Then go."

Reuben Fladge touched his cap, and with long unsteady strides went away down the road, and was quickly lost in the darkness. The tramp of his rapidly receding footsteps was heard for a few moments after he had disappeared, and it seemed to Greg's quick ears that he was running.

Greg Dorward did not ask for an explanation of this movement, and affected not to be — — by it, or — — with the charge of murder which had been made against him. He felt it was all part of the new and lucid Fada in which he stood, however, that in some way as other a chance had been offered him, and he had let it pass, as a chance of atonement to confession tonight have been offered to a guilty man.

John Woodhatch explained his himself that this was so; and yet his explanation was more of a tyranny than ever.

"I can trust Fladge," he said; "and strange it is that that poor silly fellow is the only one on whom I can rely—on whom we both can rely," he added.

"Why should I rely on him?" asked Greg. "In what way does he affect me?"

"Not at all, I hope. Your being innocent makes all things clear and straight. Your being innocent," he continued—"who, there can possibly come no harm of this. Otherwise—"

"Otherwise!" repeated Greg, in a low voice.

"Otherwise it may be—destruction!"

Greg did not reply. The mysterious nature of the forces opposing him, working against him, was beyond his power to fathom yet, and he could not confront that which at present was concealed from him. He was at war with the dead, not with the living, and he could not confront those. The old man Spikins in the church-yard, the woman still and cold at Farm Forlorn, were the enemies of his peace, and he knew not what they had said in their lifetimes, or why John Woodhatch should put his trust in them, and keep it from himself.

He had not long to speculate on this.

"We will walk by the sea, Greg," said Woodhatch; "there will be no one to marvel at us there, and then I can explain."

"I am quite ready, sir."

But there was John Woodhatch to marvel at Greg Dorward's coolness, his imperturbability. Nothing shook the nerves of the young man, who was prepared for any revelation. Surely this unconscious innocence, thought Woodhatch, and all was not deceit and bravado, after all.

They struck off from the high-road by the shady path well known to both of them as a short-cut to the sea. They did not exchange another word till the dark sands were beneath their feet, and the wind was moaning across the sea at them, where, in the distance, the restless, white-crested waves seemed rising up, like ghosts, to look at them, and wonder what their errand was at that hour. They might be speaking in hoarse murmurs of them, too, and passing the news on, mile by mile, along the shore, and dealing with it against the Yorkshire rocks some twenty miles away!

They turned in the direction of Skegs Shore, where the village was where Morris Brake was murdered, and the gray stone church where Greg was to have been married, and the silent churchyard where the man struck from life by sleeping—"unavenged," as Hester Brake considered it—where Lucy had lived, where these two men both had loved, and loved strangely, considering her past and their own.

"This way," said Greg. "Would it not be better to take the coast toward Bleathorpe? No one would meet us in that direction."

"Does it matter?"

"Not at all."

"Then we will go this way, where the truth will meet us presently," replied the farmer.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE CRISIS.

Side by side and silently for a while, went master and pupil, with God's stars shining down upon them. All was very desolate and dark; until those familiar with this long stretch of sand could have found their way upon it, or been at all at ease there. The higher sandy ridges which at daytime marked the line of coast were completely lost in the blackness of the night, and only the breaking of the waves upon the shore denoted where the sea was. All was one long, wide stretch of desolation, which grew blacker and denser as they advanced, and presently submerged them.

Here they could speak without fear of listeners. Here hardly a fisherwhite man would trust himself on such a night as this. Smuggling had gone out of fashion, and the wind came with wry reckonings across the water, and moaned piteously after sundown, as though the night was scaring it.

"There isn't a great deal to tell you, Greg, and you may answer or not, as it seems better for you," commenced John Woodhatch; "to me it is at present so like truth, it would be, if false, a lie so unnecessary and base, that I am doubted for the first time in my life. And, Greg, I am verily afraid for you, as far as one a man I have loved—whom for his good sight upward I have honored until now."

Greg's lips moved twice before he could reply, but it was too dark to see this. Then the answer came in six short words.

"I thank you for that honor," rang out on such cool, tremulous tones that the listener was startled

"It was Spikins who told Miss Brake when he considered now the truth of Morris's murder. That you know already."

"He told it for money, doubtless. What would he have not done for money?" asked Greg, in his usual tones.

"He was not a man whose bare word was to be trusted, all his life he was untrustworthy, though probably, after his fashion, faithful to me," said Woodhatch. "I did not look for virtue in him, knowing what he had been, and I had begun with him too late. But it is always true with me," he added, "and I have been a lucky man, whatever they may say in Lincoln—"

"Well, well, sir," asked Greg, a little impatiently, "what did Spikins tell Miss Brake?"

"That you were at Skegs Shore— — by the church—and hiding in the porch—on the night when Morris was with his young wife at the parson's house. Spiking had been at the Seas all the evening, and coming out had caught a glimpse of you, and had resolved to watch you, so you were watching some one else. Is that true?"

"That I was in the village late at night?"

"Yes."

"It is not true," answered Greg; "the old man has invented this."

"He had been watching the farm for many nights, for that matter. Mrs. Chadderton had set him to watch, having misgivings that all was not fair play about us. But that night," said John Woodhatch, "he had left his trust and gone to the village to drink."

"That is a drunken town's testimony, then," said Greg, very scornfully.

"Whether he was drunk or not I can not say; he only he was sober. You waited until the village lights were out, and then you went on to Morris's, where you knew Norrie was. There you waited again, and then—"

"And then," echoed Greg.

"And then Morris Brake came forth, and there was a sudden and awful struggle between you, and Morris Brake was left dead upon the road."

"It is a mad story," said Greg, in a suppressed voice. "Why should I have wanted to kill Lucy's husband? What was he to me?"

"He had done me an injury, he may be, and you were revengeful; or he had discovered you were watching him, and struck you, and in your rage you struck back and killed him. That seems the story to me. God knows if I read it aright. I am not a far-seeing man," he added; "I have no knowledge of human character; I am on a par with a child."

"How could I have killed him?" asked Greg—"he was a giant in strength to me."

"I am married to your bonds a steel spud, which has been missing from the night of the murder," continued Woodhatch. "It was mine. Mrs. Chadderton knew it was gone, and in fear of me, as though I had done it, said not a word to any living soul. It was evidence which might have hanged me had it been discovered, and it was branded with my name."

"Well?"

"You might have hidden that, more for my sake than your own, Greg Dorward. Heaven knows whether you were actuated to spare me from false evidence, to only wished to save yourself. I can not guess your thoughts," he continued, "but you hid the weapon which took Morris's life, and your cap also, which, stained with blood, had fallen into the roadway where he lay stiff and stark."

Was it fancy, or did Greg Dorward cower at this? The darkness was on thick about there him it was difficult to say. But there came no response from Greg, and it sounded as if his breath was short and quick, as though the pace at which they had been striding was almost too much for him.

"Shall I go on?" asked Woodhatch.

"Yes," was the reply, "if there is more to tell."

"There is more."

"I listen," responded Greg.

"That steel spud you buried with your cap, and spiking now you do it, and told Miss Brake where she could find them for herself," said Woodhatch. "In near the new Reformatory cap, which one lost a few days after you had come to the farm, if you remember."

"And I buried them, you say. Where?"

John Woodhatch took him by the arm, and pointed across the murky waste of sea-sand.

"Where that light is. Can you see it burning?"

"A light upon the sands?" asked Greg.

"Yes, this way, standing where I stand, you can see it in the distance."

Greg took his master's place and looked for himself.

Yes, a light was shining a few hundred yards away, amongst the timbers of the ship which had been wrecked there many years ago, and left its skeleton as testimony of disaster.

"What is there?" asked Greg, breathlessly.

"Reuben Fladge."

"What is he doing? Searching for those things?"

"Yes."

"Does he know for what purpose?"

"No. But I want to tell him, Greg, in my defense and his, for he too, poor fellow, was made the scapegoat of this crime. Unless—"

"Unless what?" asked Greg.

"Unless you trust in me to hear the truth, and—keep your secret still," answered John Woodhatch, sternly, "unless you tell me all at once."

Greg Dorward sat strangely silent, and they walked on toward the light, shining now across the sands like a beacon to guide their steps toward it.

Suddenly Greg stopped and crossed his hands together—clutched them together passionately, and looked down.

"Yes, I can trust you, master," he cried; "and—God help me!—I killed him."

"God help you indeed, my poor, weak, miserable Greg, with that man's death upon your conscience all these years!" said Woodhatch, solemnly.

He had expected the avowal; he had been waiting for it, but none the less it came upon him with a crushing force—a truth that with the night of horror nearly bore him down.

"Ah, sir! I are not on had or you may think," cried Greg, speaking quickly and earnestly. "I was not so great a villain, not his murderer in cold blood, or you have fancied, although his death is on my soul, he the one night after night—a something dead will not rest in Sloom churchyard, and will not let me be. I did [illegible] listening to your quarrel with him, and when he went away I followed almost without motive, save to know where he was going. When he came from Mr Larcum's house he saw me, and rushed at me for a spy; he struck me, hocked me, shook me like a rat, and when he let me go I killed him with the spud I had brought on my with me for protection. I did not mean to kill him—I did not know what I was doing; but at the first blow he dropped down dead. What could have been expected of a wretch like me even murder? I was incorrigible from the first. You should have left me where I was, sir; I was fit for nothing better. I was from the streets and the prison. My father and mother were bad, and I had never known what good was."

"Yes, yes," said Woodhatch, in reply; "I know. Your life might have been same, your sin might have been mine. You are the shadow of myself even in this; for I would have killed your father, and even hoped I had killed him. Why should I be your judge, your accuser?"

"Ah! you were always generous," cried Greg; "and you—you will not say a word of this. I have repented years ago: I have suffered. It was his death, after all, which made my life a different and better one. 'I will atone for this,' I said, 'until the end of my days.'"

"Atonement comes late, and you would have kept that crime concealed, or let any poor soul suffer in your stead, so that you were safe," said John Woodhatch. "No, you are no hero, no penitent—only a coward, who has acted like a coward through it all. What will you do?"

"I can not say."

"It is not safe to remain here, and I would not have you at my right hand if it were."

"No," answered Greg.

"What may come out from this day, what may have escaped, God knows, for there are many spies about the place. But I will not put a rope round the neck of one who has shared my home, my trust. You must go—you must disappear at once. And Lucy Brake must know the truth of this, when you are safe away."

"You—good God! yes," said Greg, "she must."

"To-morrow you will get away from here, ostensibly on business. In your place, I would go abroad, and by repentance, honest industry, try to make atonement for an sinful past. Money shall not be wanting."

"I have none—I can not take it from you."

"We will talk of this to-morrow. Now let me go on alone to Reuben Fladge," he said; "you will not care to come with me further."

"No, sir."

"Very well."

John Woodhatch walked on, leaving Greg Dorward looking after him, a silent, motionless figure on the sands, a man struck, as it were, into stone by the grim truth which had come to him and unmasked him. But when the master had gone a few yards, Greg was at his side again with a mad, quick plunge, and a cry as of a wounded animal. He seized the master's right hand in both of his, and held it very tightly.

"If I see you no more—if I know you no more from this night—God bless you for your mercy, Mr Woodhatch!"

Then he relinquished his grip, and was gone. He had vanished away in the darkness, leaving no trace.

John Woodhatch called to him, but there was no reply; then he walked on again toward the old dead ship, and passed through its gaunt oaken ribs into the sand-drift within, and where the lantern light was glowing, where was Reuben Fladge too, with the sand heaped high about him, standing knee-deep in a trench which he had dug, and in his hands were a long steel spud and the fragments of a boat's bleu cap.

"Here they be, sir," he said, as John Woodhatch came toward him

ENGLISH GOSSIP

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

A Secret Preacher.—The Murder of Professor Palmer.—Railway Accidents.—A Left-handed Bride.—Mr Gladstone and the Conversation.—Freeman's Diet.

A rumor has been "disturbing the peace of the metropolis" by preaching "the city's doom" from the steps of St Paul's Cathedral. One can not say that the mantle of Solomon Eagle had descended on him (because it is expressly stated that that gentleman had no clothes), nor did he carry on his head a flaming brazier, but in other respects he played the part of his famous prototype very creditably. When the Dean's verger called him, pitifully, "My poor man," and begged him not to disturb the congregation, he replied, "I am not poor, I am rich in spiritual gifts" Before the Lord Mayor, who seemed greatly scandalized at "the City" being found fault with by anybody, and especially by a nobody like the present offender, he stuck to it that he had a mission to declare its destruction. "But you have an right, sir," said his lordship, "to arrogate to yourself such things as that. If you want to preach, you should hire a room, and put up placards." For this rather unusual and Lord-Mayorish notion of a spiritual mission, the enterprising prophet had an means, even if he had the inclinations, or he has gone to prison, and become a martyr, which was perhaps his object.

The terrible details of Professor Palmer's murder by the Arabs have brought into prominence the theory of asphyxiation during a rapid descent. It appears that the professor and his companions were given the choice of deaths, and that the former preferred to fling it by a leap from a precipice. He was probably under the impression, which is the popular one, that suffocation cannot [illegible] one falls from a great height before one touches the ground. The matter depends, no doubt, upon the height from which one is precipitated; but according to La Nature, the French scientific periodical, this must be very great to cause asphyxiation. It points out that from the top of Notre Dame—the towers of which have been often the scene of suicide—the depth of fall being only 180 feet, the velocity acquired in the time (less than four seconds) is not so great as that attained on French railways, where neither engine-drivers nor stokers suffer from great speed, though passengers very often suffer from their not going half fast enough. The case is also cited of a man falling from the top of the Column of July on an awning, and escaping with only a few contusions. And Mr. Renny asserts that in the island of Oahu he was shown by the missionaries a man who had fallen from a precipitated height of 1000 feet, and not much the worse for it, having come upon a growth of ferns. Asked as to his sensations in mid-air, he said, "It was dazzling." Under these circumstances La Nature thinks it desirable, in the interests of intending suicides, that the idea of a person who falls from a great height being killed before he reaches the ground should be exploded.

Among the sufferers in a late railway accident was a parliamentary servant. He complains bitterly of the dangers of ordinary travel in this country, and has almost made up his mind never to enter a train again. A mail-coachman of the old time, finding his speedy "cattle" superseded by the iron horse, used to express himself in a similar manner. "When a beershent 'appens to a coach," he said, "why, there you are; but if anything goes wrong with a hongine, why, where are you?" He had, however, more logic on his side than our friend of the hallows, who reminds me rather of Hood's sailor, who wore lost in astonishment how people could venture to stay on land in a gale of wind, "with tiles and chimneypots a-flying."

I suppose the most ludicrous incidents in real life are always to be found in breach-of-promise cases. In one of these last week the plaintiff (plaintively enough) admits that she was "left-handed," but that her faithless swain had always known about it, and had therefore no excuse for breaking his engagement on that account. One can understand a left-handed marriage being deemed objectionable, but the fact of a young woman being left-handed would, one would have thought, have never been taken as a serious drawback to any wooer.

To my mind, the correspondence between Mr Gladstone and the young lady in consumption at Wigan is very illustrative of his character, and also most creditable to him. She sent him a book marker on his birthday, with "The Bible one Guide" marked in silk upon it, accompanied with a few words of farewell. He returns her flowers and grapes, and on autograph letter with this sentence to it: "May the guidance you are good enough to desire on my behalf avail you fully on every step of that journey in which, if I do not precede, I am not but shortly follow you." It is not only the good feeling but the courage of the man which one admires, since, poor human nature being what it is, I suppose he knows that half his own admirers will laugh at his "sentimental folly," and nine-tenths of his opponents will give it a harsher name.

If anything of what is done here below can reach [illegible] spirits, it must be the obituaries that are written of them—not by their enemies, for the principle of de mortuis is generally respected, but by their injudicious friends. In Macmillan's Magazine there is an article upon Trollope by Mr Freeman, which is enough to make that honest, straightforward story teller turn in his grave. Mr Freeman seems to have known him only in his later years, but how treated him—as he treats history—or a rough diamond style which would have immensely amused him, but which would have absolutely disgusted him as his eulogist's failure in attempting to cause him above Dickens. Mr Freeman calls "Dickens's characters" (as if he had created three, or perhaps four) "forced and unnatural caricatures." If a man can write like this of what he under his nose, the idea naturally occurs to us, "How are we to believe him when he writes history?" where he can not have the same opportunity of judgment. Nothing that Mr Freeman or any other second-class writer can affirm can push Charles Dickens from the pedestal on which he stands, yards high above all his contemporaries; but such modest and foolish words do harm to the person it is the speaker's intention to honor, by provoking comparison. Anthony Trollope was a great novelist, but he is on more to be ranked with Dickens than Mr Freeman with Carlyle or Macaulay.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

As a weather sharp, Dr E. Stone Wiggins, of Canada, is disappointing, not because his prognostications fail of fulfillment, for that is the fate of the forecasts of all weather prophets, but because he allows his equanimity to be disturbed by the result. He even seems to take it to heart that the prediction on which he said he would make his reputation failed to be verified, and he is chargeable with an act on unprofessional as acknowledging that he made an error. He is credited, however, with saying, quite recently, that the storm which he has predicted for March will be severe enough to set him right before the public, notwithstanding his recent failure. In this utterance he further betrays his weakness. As this weather prophet would have demanded that faith be put in his latest prognostication on the assumption that he had never yet fallen into an error. Evidently Dr Wiggins is made of too common stuff, he is one much like other mortals to succeed as a weather sharp.

At the instance of the judiciary, the titled personages of Prussia are required to vindicate before us on the first day of April their [illegible] the titles which they claim. It is [illegible] a good many of the "barons" will find themselves, on the last day of grace, in a mood which is supposed to prevail on that day above all others. One cause of the condition of things which led to this action of the judiciary is the fact that in many instances the second and younger sons, and even daughters, of baronial families have assumed the title when it legally belonged only to the father or eldest son.

Unusual evidence of the joyousness of the occasion is contained in a marriage announcement which appears in the Mecklenburg Gazette. The notice runs: "We have the honor to announce the marriage of our daughter Louise with Mr. Notemann, of Berlin-Schoeneberg, January 6, 1883. H Moller and wife. She was the last of the half-dozen. The Lord be praised!"

The New York Free Circulating Library, of which Mr Henry E. Pellew is president, and Miss Ellen R. Coe librarian, has purchased a building in Bond Street for its use, and is making the necessary alterations. The third annual report shows an increase in the number of persons availing themselves of the privileges of the library. Gifts of books and magazines from leading publishing houses and other friends are acknowledged.

Christian Work in New York is the title of a valuable pamphlet issued annually from the Bible House. Besides giving the annual report of the City Mission, it contains accurate information concerning all the churches of this city, such as the names of the ministers, the locations of the churches, and the hours of service.

A board of supervisors in California recently appropriated one hundred and fifty dollars for buying a wooden leg for a pauper, and charged the expenditure to "permanent repairs and improvements."

Vantalism at the Capitol in Washington this winter is said to have cost the statue of the Father of his Country a big toe, Roger Williams a little finger, and an Indian woman in the Columbian group all the fingers of her right hand.

A recent issue of the Philadelphia Telegraph describes the rooms which Mr G. W. Childs, proprietor of the Public Ledger, has fitted up for his city editor and reporters at an outlay of some five thousand dollars. City Editor McWade will make his assignments while sitting in a rocking-chair which is described as a wonder of ease and elegance, before a desk especially designed for him. His feet will rest on an Axminster carpet of beautiful design, and the light from without will be subdued by curtains of old-gold fabric suspended by brass rings from bars of beaten copper. He will be separated from his reporters by a partition of stained glass set in lead, the haunt of which is said to surpass everything of its kind that has been seen in Philadelphia before. The reporters will prepare their copy at cabinet desks under costly brass chandeliers filled with bath gas and electric burners. All the floor of walnut and ash are heavy Turkish rugs. The wall paper of both rooms is rich and costly. The rooms are said to be the finest of their kind in the world.

The Boston Advertiser has celebrated recently its removal to a new six-story marble building by issuing a twenty-page paper containing a history of the Advertiser from its beginning, seventy years ago, with biographies of its former editors, and an article on journalism in Boston. The new building is provided with the most valuable modern appliances, including the electric light.

The Inspector of Buildings has been commendably active since the recent disastrous fire in Milwaukee. Not long ago he directed that fire-escapes be placed on the outer walls of the House for the Detention of Witnesses, which is in reality a prison. The windows opening upon the fire-escapes—which were promptly put in place—are heavily barred, and in case of fire it would be no possible to get to the fire-escapes or it is to get to them when there is on fire. It is said that the inspector will order that openings be made through the grating at the windows, but if this be done the House of Detention will no doubt. The dilemma is perplexing—the more so because many of the inmates of the house are there through no fault of sufficient gravity to make their detention justifiable if it deprives them of any of the facilities enjoyed by persons at large for escaping peril in the form of flames.

THE YOUNG MEN'S STUDY.

JACOB SLEEPER HALL
BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

A few steps northeast from the State-house, in the direction of the City Hall, within the triangle formed by drawing connecting lines between the library buildings of the Boston Athenæum, the Massachusetts Historical Society, and the New England Historical and Genealogical Society, the Corporation of Boston University have found a remarkably central, quiet, and eligible site for the new hall which is to be the home of "The College of Liberal Arts." The building was dedicated some weeks ago with addresses by his Excellency Governor Long, President Eliot of Harvard University, General Francis A. Walker, President of the Institute of Technology, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

The Hon. Jacob Sleeper, whose name the new hall bears, is one of the three founders of the University, the other two being the late Isaac Rich, Esq., and the late Hon. Lee Claflin, father of ex-Governor William Claflin. For twelve years Mr Sleeper was an overseer of Harvard University, and for two or three terms a member of the Executive Councils of Governors Banks and Andrew. He is Vice-President of the Corporation of Boston University, and has been from the beginning one of the most liberal, influential, and devoted members of the board, and a life-long friend of education.

The front of the building on Somerset Street is eighty feet. It is built of pressed and moulded brick and terra cotta. In appearance it is massive and substantial, with deeply recessed openings and bold projections. The style is a freely treated Renaissance. A part of the windows have the transom lights glazed with quarry glass, and other sashes are filled in with cathedral glass in delicate tones in small squares. The transom light over the front doorway is of quarry glass in quiet colors, forming the monogram B. U. and 2 S. on either side of a central wreath of laurel. Passing the main entrance doors one sees two marble tablets, on which are directories for the guidance of visitors. Further on are the offices of the Registrar and Treasurer, the tasteful study of the young men, and a University Chapel. A private entrance for ladies adjacent at the left of the front opens into a corridor extending the whole depth of the building to the ladies' gymnasium, drawing-room, parlor, and study. From the main entrance hall, which has a width of thirteen feet and a floor of marble tiling, rise the main stairways, one on either hand, leading to the upper stories, where are found a large lecture-hall, lecture-rooms, offices for the President, Deans, and professors. Perhaps the most attractive room of all is the spacious "Study for Young Ladies," a sketch of which is given herewith. A brick fire-place of generous width is built the whole height of the room, ornamented with moulded brick, inscribed terra-cotta panels, and Chelsea tiles. A niche above the fire-place contains a bust of Minerva. At either side of the chimney is a deep oaken settle. The ends of the room are semicircular in plan, and have wide dimensions of corresponding shape. It is intended to place in the centre of one of these semicircles a life-sized statue now being cut in Italy. The side of the room opposite to the fire-place has a writing appliances, extending its whole length, with desks and a triplet window glazed with antique quarry-work, cut crystals, and opalescent glass. These windows make a beautiful bit of color set into the deep terra-cotta-colored walls. A polished hard-wood floor, Turkey rugs, and large leather-covered library tables complete the fittings of this room. The "Young Men's Study," on the first floor at the entrance, is also appropriate and attractive, being a good reference library, study tables, and other desirable conveniences. A separate and well appointed gymnasium is also provided for the young men.

The liberal ideas and aims of the University were illustrated about a year ago by the creation of sixty-four free scholarships, which are to be divided among deserving and needy students of both sexes equally, which is equivalent for those receiving them to absolutely free tuition. These scholarships are named in honor of the first founder, Isaac Rich.

It is well known that Boston University was the first ever organized from the start, and in all departments, without respect to sex. Its radical principles have not harmed it. Though but ten years old it has [illegible] students, an honorable long and thorough record, more than one distinguished graduate, and its professional schools and its post-graduate School of Advanced Studies are [illegible] prosperous. The School of Law is the largest in New England, numbering one hundred and ninety students. Yet it was the first in America to present and insist upon a three years' course of study as a prerequisite to graduation. The whole number of students at present in attendance at the University is 572. It is intended that the new "Jacob Sleeper Hall" shall be but the first of a series of buildings, to be erected as the means shall be provided, until all the different departments of the University shall be as conveniently and worthily housed as is at present the College of Liberal Arts.

THE YOUNG LADIES' STUDY.

THE ARMOR-PLATE TRIALS AT SPEZIA.

The contest between gun and armor, which began more than twenty years ago, still continues. At first the advantage was on the side of the defense, for with the 68-pounder, the heaviest gun then afloat, even the iron skins of the early armored vessels were impenetrable. The call for heavier ordnance successively produced the huge American smooth-bores and the powerful rifled guns of Armstrong, Krupp, Whitworth, and others. With the attack then in the ascendant, the iron-founders re-enforced the targets with still stouter plates, but the gun-makers, rallying, by their device of chambering, their mammoth grain powder, their improved projectiles, and their hydraulic gear, again seized the lead. Meanwhile Italy, redeemed and renewing her youth under Victor Emanuel, pressed again into the front rank of naval powers, as if the spirits of her dukes and doges had risen from a sleep of centuries in lead her on. With the audacious conception of her Duilio and Dandolo, her Re'na and Lepanto, she surpassed all maritime powers alike in artillery and armor. It was natural that her trial ground should become the central arena of the struggle of cannon against cuirass, and the fortified shores of the noble bay of Spezia soon eclipsed the fame of Shoeburyness and Gâvre.

The recent November experiments at Spezia were undertaken by command of the Italian Minister of Marine. Their immediate [illegible] was the Polygon of Muggiano, made famous by the trials of [illegible] a dozen years before. The attack was intrusted to those masters in gunnery the French [illegible] muzzle-loading [illegible] of Sir William Armstrong. The three plates competing in the defense were Schneider & Co.'s, from Le Creusot, France, and Charles Cammell & Co.'s and John Brown & Co.'s, from Sheffield, England. The plates were each 11 feet long, 8½ broad or high, and 19 inches thick, weighing about thirty-six tons, and were adequately backed by oak and by metallic targets, to which they were bolted according to the systems of the respective competitors.

To announce at the outset the result of this great match for supremacy, the triumph which the Creusot workshops won in 1876 was renewed in 1882. The immediate outcome of the former trials was the selection of the Schneider homogeneous all-steel plate for covering the Duilio and Dandolo, while a collateral result was the adoption by the English founders of compound plates composed of iron covered with a layer of steel in place of the all-iron plaque. Schneider, on his part, perfected his own products, and saw them practiced by applied in the new Formidable, Terrible, and Furieux of the French navy, while the compound plates were adopted not only by the British Admiralty in their latest war ships, but were accepted by Italy for the Italia. But as Italy desired plates surpassing even the Duilios in impenetrability, the old rivals were at length brought together in the new competition.

The gun was set at a distance of not quite [illegible] yards. The projectiles, made at the San Vito Arsenal from pig-iron furnished by the Georgetti Foundry, weighed each 2,000 pounds. The powder was from the Fossano Mills, about two grains to the pound. According to the rules adopted for the test, the first shot at each plate was to be fired with a charge only sufficient to exactly perforate 19 inches of iron, and the firing was then to be continued with a charge such as would perforate a plate 21 inches thick. Computations ascertained the required charge to be in the first instance somewhat over 228 pounds, and afterward somewhat over 278.

At the first shot both the English plates were badly cracked; the projectiles broke off after penetrating 14 inches into the Brown plate, and 6 into the Cammell. The cracks were not only numerous, but several extended all the way through. The Brown plate kept on cracking after the shot had been fired into it, thus indicating that its molecular [illegible] had been deranged. The [illegible] was badly wrecked and the [illegible] and [illegible] broken. The Schneider plate, on the other hand, was absorbed without a crash. The projectile [illegible] lost 8 inches, when it broke off, and the wall of the target remained wholly intact in all its parts. The [illegible] had been directed at the lower corners of the respective plates. The second series of shots, delivered with a velocity of about 518 yards, instead of 498 as before, completed the ruin of the English plates. They were broken into fragments, which fell at the foot of the target. A piece of the Harvey plate remained hanging to the backing by a broken side, but the backing of the Cammell plate was stripped bare and much broken. The shot delivered against the Schneider plate had made but a few insignificant cracks: the projectile only penetrated about 9 inches, or less than half the thickness, and had broken into many pieces, while the plate remained entire on the target, which was [illegible] and had not been moved.

ness and weight than those at Spezia. At Constadt the attack was by no 17-inch Armstrong breech-loader. It must also be stated that some of the English experts maintain that the Sennerian victory at Spezia was due solely to a better system of bolting the plates to the ships.

M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S

CYCLOPÆDIA.

Having recently completed this great work, it gives us great pleasure to call once the notice to all those who are in any way interested in Biblical, theological, and ecclesiastical studies.

The importance of this work to every student of the Sacred Scriptures, and of all branches of religious knowledge, is very apparent. The largeness of its scope, the peculiarity of its statements, its fulness of information, the liberal spirit in which all questions of religious doctrine are treated, the absence of an unnecessary display of mere technical learning, combined with its the approval of readers in general, irrespective of their denominational views. To insure the completeness essential in a work so comprehensive, the scholarship of Europe and America has been laid under contribution. Every work, ancient and modern, which could throw light upon disputed points of geography, history, biography, or doctrine, has been carefully examined by competent men, who have culled from the pages whatever was necessary to further this design, and to carry out the purpose of the projectors—which was to make this Cyclopædia a repository of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature so complete and comprehensive that the possessor of it would enjoy all the fruits of ages of learned research in these branches of knowledge.

A FEW NOTICES OF THE PRESS, Etc.

This work has long since taken its place as a standard of theological and Biblical information. * * * There is no work in the English language which is at once so full and comprehensive as this one. Neither do we know its equal in any language. * * * For the minister and the general student it is an invaluable treasure, while for general use in any home there is nothing that could serve as a substitute.—Christian Advocate, N. Y.

This Cyclopædia is undoubtedly the most useful yet constructed either here or in Europe. It is both available to its design and execution, and timely in its appearance, and may be recommended as having an rival.—Nation, N. Y.

From the Rev. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON.

The Cyclopædia is invaluable for the Biblical and theological student.

From the Rev. PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D.

It is truly an opus magnum and an honor to American scholarship, industry, and enterprise. The whole work is of theological reference library of inestimable value, and is not likely to be superseded for the next twenty years. * * * I authorize you to add my name to the list of scholars who recommend the work.

WONDERFUL REVELATIONS OF THE MICROSCOPE.

DISCOVERY OF THE MOST DEADLY ENEMY OF MANKIND. THE BACILLUS AND ITS RAVAGES.

The scientific world has been greatly startled and agitated of late by the discovery with the microscope of the most dreadful enemy of mankind, in the form of myriads of little death-dealing pestilences. The air we breathe and live in is charged with these deadly little growths in proportion as it is infected from various noxious sources. Having by recent experiments and research been shown to be the most fruitful cause of disease known, and the welfare and health of every individual depending as largely on the freedom from their destructive ravages, it is but natural that the reports of recent investigators in this field of scientific inquiry should be widely read, and that every phase of these astounding discoveries should be subject to universal discussion. At first received with some suspicion, they have at length been thoroughly proven, and are now receiving the unqualified endorsements of the leading scientific men throughout the world. But little else is talked of in the schools and clubs of science, and the medical and scientific journals are crowded with the testimony that is being added corroborative of the value of the marvellous discovery, which is pronounced the greatest advance in medical science of modern times.

To L. PASTEUR, the eminent French scientist, who by his learned investigations has saved to France so many millions of dollars, is probably due the honor of first pointing out the terrible power of these germs. In recognition of his great service the government has recently voted him from the public treasury $10,000, with which to continue his experiments. He has described several varieties of these parasites, some comparatively harmless, others extremely dangerous. One form he proved, by a series of vaccinations and other conclusive experiments, was the cause of death of many thousands of animals and herds of cattle; another, the active agent in the death of fowls by cholera. Acting upon the knowledge he had gained of the nature of these germs, he pointed out a means of relief that speedily prevented a spread of the diseases and ended their devastations.

TYNDALL, with the aid of other eminent English investigators, made a number of examinations of the floating particles in the atmosphere, and found numbers of living spores capable of producing disease. In dry and healthy localities but few germs were found, and those of the harmless varieties, while in low, damp places, crowded houses, and unhealthy cities, the poisonous germs were extremely numerous everywhere.

Dr. RICHARD KOCH, of Wollstein, Germany, a man whose work in connection with the organisms of contagious diseases has made him a recognized authority upon the subject, by experimenting after the methods of VILLEMIN, has discovered and published an account of one of the most dangerous varieties, to which it is proven more deaths are due than to any disease incident to the human race.

He describes it to a simple cellular organism belonging to the same order as the bacteria. When dried the germs may, without losing any vitality, endure great extremes of temperature. Being so fine and so light as dust, invisible to the naked eye, they may be blown any distance by the wind or carried upon the clothing or body. Like seeds, they may lie for months or years undisturbed upon the furniture, floor, carpets, curtains, walls, or in the bedding, and only requiring a proper degree of warmth, moisture, and food to waken into life, develop, and grow. They thrive and live on the blood, lymph, mucus, and secretions of the human body. When the system is unhealthy or weak they attack the cells that make up the animal tissue. Any albuminous food will furnish them with food for growth, and a single drop is sufficient to contain hundreds. Examined with microscope of great power, which enlarge them no that they can be seen and studied, they have the appearance of minute rod like bodies, having, when active, some power of motion. They bend in the middle like a bow, and straighten with a jerk that sends them a few times their own length. At the temperature of the human body they are the most active.

Their power of increase or reproduction is remarkably great. One germ, in a few weeks' time, under favorable conditions, will give rise to millions. The process is by simple growth and division. Cold destroys or prevents their growth, and this is why refrigeration prevents decay of meats and other animal foods. Exposed to warmth, these small organisms attack and eat up the albuminous tissues, leaving a foul mass. The odors so common to the process are given off by those minute organisms, and is about the only indication of their presence. This is the warning of nature, and it is an instinct to avoid all such smells. The foul breath, bad odors of old sores, etc., leads man to avoid these germs in a great measure. The danger of their presence in the body can be imagined when their rapid increase is considered. A few germs may be readily absorbed into the system by breathing air containing them. They are then drawn into the interior of the body through the long and narrow respiratory passages of the throat, chest, and nose, which are lined with soft membrane and covered with sticky mucus. In this fluid they find ready lodgment and favorable conditions for development, increase, and growth. The "cold" or catarrh, comma or chronic catarrh, hay fever, etc., are common manifestations of the effects of one of the least harmful of these germs or microorganisms. In the discharges from the respiratory passages at such times thousands of the living animalcules are found. The fever, debility, pains "in the bones," loss of appetite, etc., are indications of their depressing effects upon the vital organs.

It is from germs of slower development, however, that the greatest danger follows. To the one most fully described by Koch is due more deaths than to any other known cause. According to the researches of CZYZER, FLINT, and BILLINGS, over eight million people die every year from this cause alone. The annual deaths in France, England, Germany, and Russia from their destruction was over one and a half millions. In the United States and Canada over three hundred thousand persons perished in the last year from the bacillus alone. The most common disease resulting from it is consumption of the lungs, but other organs of the body are liable to be affected, as they develop slowly but surely in any organ that may be in a weak or unhealthy state.

If active and healthy, the liver, kidneys, and bowels have to a wonderful extent the power of expelling these deadly animalcule or parasites from the system. And this fact furnishes an important indication for the successful treatment of all the long list of maladies caused by these parasites, as will be hereafter shown.

The studies of LANCISCA, an eminent Italian, and WOOD, FOWLER, and others, are interesting, as showing the large variety of chronic diseases so heretofore classified that result from these germs. Among the most common were "liver complaint," biliousness or torpid liver, dyspepsia or indigestion, lung affections, bronchitis, kidney diseases, chronic diarrhœa, spinal complaint, fever-sores, white swellings, hip joint disease, rheumatism, malarial diseases, such as fever and ague or intermittent fever, general and nervous debilities, female weaknesses, chronic catarrh of the head, or ozena, many forms of unhealthy discharges from internal organs, and all the various scrofulous affections of the skin, glands, bones, joints, etc., including consumption, which is but scrofulous disease of the lungs.

In this large catalogue of apparently widely differing diseases, but really all depending upon a common cause, and therefore naturally to be successfully treated on the same general principles, examination of the blood and secretions revealed large numbers of these parasites, and, curiously enough, the number bore a direct relation to the severity of the disease, a comparatively small number being present in mild cases and a very large proportion in bad cases. Under the use of the specific treatment which they gave and which is substantially the same as that described and recommended later in this review, the number was seen to steadily diminish from day to day, until, with the restoration of health and bodily strength, they could not be found at all.

The greatest variety of symptoms were found to accompany their presence, due to peculiarities of the constitution, the part of the body most seriously affected, and the efforts of the different organs to rid the system of these germs. Among the most common were frequent headaches, neuralgic pains, nausea, constipation, pain or variable appetites, diarrhœa, bad breath, hectic fever, cough, night-sweats, cold extremities, dyspepsia, catarrh, sore throat, sore eyes, etc., a list, where the skin was affected, salt-rheum, boils, carbuncles, scurf skin, eruptions, St. Anthony's fire, and other symptoms were common, and all gradually but with certainty were cured by the same means. The hectic fever so often met with in consumptives, with the hacking or tearing cough, night sweats, diarrhœa, and other symptoms due to the efforts of nature to throw off and expel these germs, were also readily controlled and cured in the same way as were the old sores, abscesses and ulcers in the lungs, liver, and other important organs.

The corrosive acids and mineral poisons are found to possess the power of killing these germs, but the dangerous nature of such powerful agents prevents their internal use. For the purpose of expelling the germs when once within the system, it is necessary to resort to vegetable remedies, in order to cleanse the blood of the germs without injury to the patient.

An American physician of large experience in the treatment of all forms of chronic diseases, now really known to be caused by parasitic life for many years devoted much time to the investigation of the causes of these affections, and in the treatment of many thousands of cases developed and thoroughly tested a combination of vegetable agents, which he used with marvellous success in their cure.

In cases of wasting disease, or consumption, or scrofula of the lungs, and other organs, and in all cases attended with great weakness, it was found to exert the most wonderful tonic and restorative influences, besides its nutritive properties far surpass those of cod-liver oil or any of the remedial agents resorted to by the medical profession in such cases. Hypophosphites, iron, and quinine bear no comparison to it in building up the strength of the debilitated. The recipe as advised by him has been used for years with the greatest success in a vast and most successful practice.

The written experiences of the many sufferers who have been cured, and who express in terms of the highest praise their endorsement of its great value, are sufficient to fill volumes. Living witnesses are everywhere, monuments to modern genius and scientific progress in the healing art.

Sufferers from "liver complaint," giving rise to "bad blood," consumption, scrofula, and other affections and symptoms, the results of blood poisoning from the ravages of the deadly parasites or disease-germs so briefly referred to, find in this remedy prompt relief and a permanent cure. The great and increasing demand for this God-given and peerless remedy for so many apparently different, but really kindred, ailments, led to its preparation in pure and convenient form under the name of Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It can be obtained the world over at drug and general stores, and full directions for its use will be found in the pamphlet that surrounds each bottle. It exerts the most wonderful stimulating and invigorating influence on the liver, that greatest gland of the human system, which has been not unaptly termed the "housekeeper of our health." Through the increased action of the liver and other excretory organs of the system, all poisonous germs are rendered inactive and gradually expelled from the system with other impurities. In some cases, where there are unhealthy discharges, as from the nostrils in cases of either acute or chronic catarrh, the use of Dr Sage's Catarrh Remedy, a mild and healing antiseptic lotion, should be associated with the use of the Discovery. It is also advisable to use this lotion in other local manifestations of disease of mucous surfaces. By this means the germs of disease are destroyed and the membranes cleansed before any of the poisonous bacilli are absorbed into the blood. In sore throat, quinsy, or diphtheria, the Catarrh Remedy should be used as a gargle, and the Golden Medical Discovery taken freely.

In women, where weakness of special organs is common and almost certain to be developed, attended by backache, bearing-down sensations and other local symptoms, the use of Dr Pierce's Favorite Prescription, in conjunction with that of the Discovery, speedily restores the healthy functions and assists in building up and invigorating the system.

In any case where the bowels have been costive and are not regulated and acted upon sufficiently by the mild laxative properties possessed by the Golden Medical Discovery, Dr Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets (little liver pills), taken in small doses of only one or two each day, will aid materially in establishing healthy action, and in expelling the disease-producing germs from the blood and system.

At the risk of repetition and by way of recapitulation, we may truthfully say that Golden Medical Discovery cures all humors, from the most scrofula to a common blotch, pimple, or eruption. Erysipelas, salt-rheum, fever-sores, scaly or rough skin, in short, all diseases caused by disease germs in the blood, are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great eating allowers rapidly heal under its benign influences. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing tetter, rose rash, boils, carbuncles, sore eyes, scrofulous sores and swellings, white swellings, goitre or thick neck, and enlarged glands.

"The blood is the life." Thoroughly cleanse this fountain of health by using Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength, and soundness of constitution are established.

Consumption, which is scrofulous disease of the lungs, induced by the deadly disease-germ, bacillus, is promptly and positively arrested and cured by this sovereign remedy, if taken before the last stages of the disease are reached. From its wonderful power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr Pierce thought favorably of calling it his "consumption cure," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine that, from its wonderful assimilation of gc ms-destroying, as well as tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, and bilious, diuretic, properties, and nutritive properties, is unequalled, not only as a remedy for consumption of the lungs, but for all chronic diseases of the liver, blood, kidneys, and lungs.

If you feel dull, drowsy, debilitated, have sallow color of skin, or yellowish-brown spots on face or body, frequent headache or dizziness, bad taste in mouth, coated tongue, alternate chilliness with hot flashes, low spirits and gloomy forebodings, irregular appetite, and tongue coated, you are suffering from indigestion, dyspepsia, and torpid liver or "biliousness." In many cases only part of these symptoms are experienced. As a remedy for all such cases Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has no equal, as it effects perfect and radical cures.

For weak lungs, spitting of blood, short breath, consumptive night-sweats, and kindred affections, it is a sovereign remedy. In the cure of bronchitis, severe coughs, and consumption, it has established the medical faculty, and eminent physicians pronounce it the greatest medical discovery of the age. The nutritive properties possessed by cod-liver oil are trifling when compared with those of the Golden Medical Discovery. It rapidly builds up the system and increases the flesh and weight of those reduced below the usual standard of health by wasting diseases.

The plan of treatment that we have or briefly outlined in this article for the large class of chronic diseases referred to has long been acknowledged to be the most successful, based as it is upon the belief, shared by the most skilful medical men of the day, that the only way to get rid of the noxious disease-producing germs in the blood and system is through the liver, kidneys, and bowels, and therefore that those agents which are known to act most efficiently in restoring healthy action of those organs are the ones most to be relied upon. For this purpose the Golden Medical Discovery is pre-eminently the agent that fulfils every indication of treatment required.

HALE'S HONEY.

ONE of the best and most reliable remedies for Throat and Lung affections is found in this old-established and well-known remedy, Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. This is especially the case in families where there are young children, as a dose administered upon the first symptoms of croup will not only speedily relieve but in little sufferer, but, by continued expectoration, prevents the convulsion of which usually ensues, which is at once the terror of parents and the despair of physicians. This remedy should always be kept in the house, as it may sometimes save the life of little ones taken in the night (as a sudden call. Ask your druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar (full name), and take no substitute.

FINED FOR CONTEMPT.

The Consequence of Violating an Injunction.—A Peculiar Case.

In the action of Stewart Hartshorn against Charles Pease, involving an infringement of a patent granted to the plaintiff, and in which he is therefore it an granted restraining Pease from engaging in the manufacture of certain articles as stated by Judge Wallace of the United States Circuit Court was procured today ordering Pease to have been guilty of contempt of court and imposing a fine of $500 or imprisonment for the term of three months if the fine be not paid within ten days. The case against Pease was among those here referred to United States Commissioner Reichhelm as master to take testimony, who reported that, on account of the defendant's violation of an injunction which had previously been issued, restraining him from manufacturing the patent in suit the complainant had been put to the expense of $3,000, and $75 master's fees. Judge Wallace confirms the master's report.

Published March 6, contains the opening chapter of a new Serial Story, entitled RAISING THE "PEARL."

BY JAMES OTIS,

Author of "Toby Tyler," "Tim and Tip," "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," etc.

Probably no American writer has so firm a hold on the affections of the young readers of this country as MR. OTIS. From the date of the publication of his first story in YOUNG PEOPLE his popularity has steadily increased, and from all sides the little folk send us letters demanding fresh stories from his pen. This new story will add fresh laurels to the wreath that small fingers have woven for him. The scenes are laid in a most interesting part of our land; the characters are well drawn; it is a hunting story, such as boys always delight in, and lastly, it possesses the charm and spirit that characterizes MR. END OF THE FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

THE instructions of the autumn elections to the late Congress were universally understood. The country was resolved that the spoils system which had murdered GARFIELD should be reformed, and that the superfluous revenue which led to the extravagances of the Rivers and Harbor Bill of last summer, and to the corruption which always accompanies a surplus, should be reduced by a revision of the revenue system. The President correctly interpreted the elections, and in his annual Message to Congress recommended certain "immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the government," adding the pregnant remark that "only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the government." He opposed the total abolition of internal taxes, for two reasons—first, because it was not clear that with the $100,000,000 required for pensions during the year the duties on imports would supply the needs of the government; and second, because the total abolition of excise taxes would prevent a thorough revision of the tariff. He also stated with force the necessity of reform in the methods of appointment to office, and commending the PENDLETON bill, promised his hearty co-operation in such proper measures of reform as should be devised by Congress. The President's position was frank and patriotic, his suggestions were sagacious, and his sincerity was unquestionable. Congress at once heeded his counsel so far as to pass promptly the reform bill that he had mentioned favorably, and then fell into a prolonged debate upon the revision of the tariff, which he had also urged. But the course and circumstances of the discussion showed clearly that neither party had a definite policy upon the subject, and that the debate was but the bitter contention of vast private interests, not an endeavor to promote the public welfare.

Toward the end of the session the Senate passed a tariff bill. But nobody in the Senate or in the country could probably have given an intelligent account of it, or pointed out any principle in its construction. During the debate a great deal of valuable miscellaneous information upon the resources and industries of the United States was contributed by the members from different parts of the country. But the bill itself was a patchwork of compromises and crude alterations, the scope of which was not perceived, and which, upon engrossing, produced extraordinary results, imposing burdens which were not intended, and revealing the ease with which a complicated and obscure scheme of duties, devised to promote a myriad selfish interests, may be perverted innocently or unintentionally to do injustice to the public interest. The political result of the debate, however, was significant. It showed, as we have said, that upon the fundamental question of the principles upon which the revenue for the support of the government should be raised neither of the existing parties has a clearly defined and harmonious understanding. Upon this subject Pennsylvania Democrat, is as widely [illegible] BECK, a Kentucky Democrat, as Mr. KELLEY, a Pennsylvania Republican, from Mr. KASSON, an Iowa Republican. Upon details of the tariff involving the local industries of their own States men of all parties winced and flinched. Yet the situation in Congress doubtless represents accurately the situation in the country. Few Republicans or Democrats adhere to their party because of its position upon this subject. Party cohesion is due to tradition, and even if the Democratic party should seem to any independent man to hold, upon the whole, a more reasonable position than the Republican upon the principle of a revenue tax, the general grounds of distrust which are offered by a party so overwhelmingly discredited by the events of a generation as the Democratic are sufficient to withhold him from its support.

Even the adoption of the report of the conference committee on the tariff, during the closing hours of the session, while it effects a considerable saving in the revenue, will not satisfy the country as it would had it been a more consistent and comprehensive measure. But on the whole the political result of the session will be advantageous for the Republicans in the prompt passage of a reform bill, and the good faith of the President in intrusting its enforcement to its friends. The Democratic party has missed its opportunities. Its course has but deepened the general conviction of its unfitness for administration. Instead of justifying its own loud declarations, and pressing forward as the champion of reform, it was dragged along by popular sentiment and by the Republican movement. If it had been in earnest, it would have removed one of the chief impediments in its way, which is the apprehension of "a clean sweep" of the offices, and a consequent dangerous disturbance of the public service, in the event of its success. So in the tariff debate, if it had offered a simple and consistent scheme as a substitute for the Republican bill, or had proposed the amendment of that bill upon some sound and well-defined principle, it would have had the advantage which always results from such a position. Upon the whole, as we have said, the late session of Congress fairly represents the political situation. It is obscure and doubtful, and mainly because the independent sentiment is stronger and more general than ever. In New York, where the majority for the Democratic candidate was enormous, the conduct of the Democratic Legislature has weakened Democratic prospects. In a great State a party will be measured by its representatives, and a party whose chief representatives are such as, with few exceptions, the Democrats even of the city of New York send to the Legislature, is not thereby commended to public favor. It must be said, therefore, that the close of the Forty-seventh Congress shows the strong probability of the determination of the election of 1884 by the independent vote, and that as yet the Democrats have done nothing to attract it.

THE CHANGE IN THE NEW YORK NAVAL OFFICE.

THE most friendly interpretation of the recent change in the New York Naval Office can not reconcile it with the President's declarations in both his annual Messages to Congress. He has emphatically announced that the public business should be transacted upon business principles, and that tenure should not depend upon personal or merely partisan service. Upon this sound principle a change in so important a position as the Naval Office in the New York Custom-house could be made only upon public grounds. The failure to re-appoint an officer of the first capacity, of the highest character, and of long experience, and to whom, more than to any other single person, is due the efficient enforcement of the reformed system, in which the President has expressed his hearty concurrence, is an act so injurious to the service, to the reformed system, and to the President's consistency that some explanation is due to the country.

The attempted justification is that the late Naval Officer is promoted to be Chief Examiner. But how is an office promoted by being reduced from a position of $6000 to one of $3000 a year! If the interests of the reformed system be consulted, the sincere co-operation of the Naval Office is indispensable. Now the late Naval Officer is the most sagacious and efficient friend of the new system in the service. His successor, however excellent a gentleman, deliberately abandoned it as chimerical. The late Naval Officer courteously but firmly disregarded "bosses" and "heelers" and all the familiar political and party bummers and shysters, protected his clerks against extortion, and brought his office to such a point of ability and efficiency that it was officially pronounced one of the most admirably conducted offices in the entire public service. For these reasons he has been bitterly denounced by the trading politicians, who have sworn to have his head," and at length his place is filled by a successor more agreeable to them, and indifferent, if not hostile, to the principles upon which the office has been administered. The conclusion is inevitable that if the late Naval Officer had propitiated the politicians, and had "run" his office as a party bureau, he would have retained his place, and that consequently his nomination to be Chief Examiner, at a greatly reduced salary, means merely that he was to be punished for fidelity to the very principles which the Commission is to carry out.

When the President was removed from the Collectorship of the port he was offered a foreign position, which he declined, for the reason that if he was qualified to be a Consul, he was equally fitted to be Collector. If the late Naval Officer be qualified as Chief Examiner, of which there is no doubt, he is still more fitted to fill the office that he held. He and every other sincere friend of the reformed system is compelled to see that the circumstances of his transfer show either a want of comprehension, or a deliberate disregard of the true principles of the public service. This is the more to be regretted because the country was disposed to believe that the President intended to carry out in good faith the reform so earnestly desired. But this action can not but have the most demoralizing effect upon the service, because it is a warning to all efficient and devoted officers that they defy bosses and bummers at their peril, and it enables the most venal politicians to exult at the overthrow of reform in its stronghold. The Naval Office was a test case, and it is decided against the reformed system.

THINGS UNDONE.

SENATOR DAVIS'S resignation of the Presidency of the Senate to enable a successor to be chosen recalls the great omissions of this Congress. Congress ended on the 4th of March, and there is no Vice-President, and Senator DAVIS'S term expired that day. Consequently, had he chosen to retain his seat without permitting the choice of a successor, there would have been no President of the Senate, and no constitutional successor to the President in case of his death or inability, and no officer competent to call Congress together. This situation has been perfectly well known to Congress, but it has chosen to do nothing.

There are now some twelve hundred cases on the calendar of the Supreme Court. It is impossible for the court to keep pace with them, and every new case is placed at the foot of the calendar, and may not be reached for three years. Here is a denial of justice. But the situation has been long known. It has been discussed by the ablest lawyers. A simple and feasible plan has been devised, presented to Congress, and approved, after most careful consideration, by the American Bar Association. Congress knows the situation and the necessity, and has quietly disregarded them, and has done nothing.

The procedure at the electoral count by Congress is so obscure and doubtful that the continuity of the government might be easily arrested by a difference of opinion between the two Houses. In 1877 the situation brought the country to the edge of civil convulsion. It is now one of the most serious dangers that threaten the country. It has been elaborately discussed. The urgency is admitted. The settlement of the difficulty is perfectly simple, and a measure providing it has been long before Congress. Another Presidential election approaches, and Congress has done nothing. As parties will be tried at that election by their course in Congress, it is unfortunate that the responsible party should have left all these important things undone.

IRELAND IN AMERICA.

MR. PARNELL is naturally irritated. He is a small man in a commanding position, and although entirely free of complicity in the cowardly Phœnix Park murders, he can not but see that the agitation of which he is the leader, unless controlled, as he can not control it, easily leads to ghastly crimes. The man who tells an ignorant and superstitious and wretchedly destitute people, who can barely scratch a subsistence out of the ground, that they are the victims of a cruel tyranny, that the land on which they starve has been stolen from them, and that they ought not to pay rent for it, and ought to Boycott any one who differs from them, certainly can not be surprised when some of his hearers decide to strike a blow to rid their country of some of the officers of the government whom he has described as DANTON, had he lived in Rome, might have described NERO and CALIGULA.

This is the situation of MR. PARNELL, and put upon his defense, instead of expressing abhorrence of the crimes, he denounces the tyranny of the government. In doing this he taunts the British Ministry by declaring that he has a million of Irish-Americans behind him. If the people whom he thus describes were exiles waiting only the overthrow of the tyranny to return to their country, the remark would not be offensive. But here is a politician in the British Parliament who in an angry Parliamentary contest announces that the strength of his position lies in the support of a million American citizens. If this declaration be true, it signifies a divided allegiance upon the part of those citizens. It is a proclamation that the chief interest of a great body of voters in this country lies in another country, and that, in fact, they are grossly abusing the right of American citizenship to which they have been admitted. On the same morning that MR. PARNELL'S speech was reported it was stated that the British Government had demanded of our authorities the extradition of an Irishman named SHERIDAN, charged as an accomplice in the Dublin murders.

In our treaty of extradition with England "criminal charges arising from wars or intestine commotions" are, according to President TYLER and Mr. WEBSTER, excepted from the operation of the treaty. But the condition is specific that any person claimed for surrender upon a charge of crime shall be surrendered if the evidence adduced would be sufficient to hold him for trial in this country. No distinction is made between political murder and other murder; and if SHERIDAN upon the evidence produced would be committed for trial in the United States, the treaty would seem to require his surrender. Persons claimed as political offenders, of course, we should not deliver; and if it can be shown that the assassination in Phœnix Park was in any just sense an act of war or of intestine commotion in the ordinary sense of the words, the person claimed would not be surrendered. But Mr. WEBSTER could hardly have meant to make America a harbor for everybody who might commit a crime in another country during political troubles, because intestine commotion can readily be made the pretext for the gratification of private malice. The Sun cogently asks whether the British Government would have refused to surrender WILKES BOOTH, had he escaped to Canada, on the ground that the assassination of Mr. LINCOLN arose from intestine commotions.

A FRENCH FOLLY.

THE recommendation of the new FERRY Ministry in France that the members of old royal houses who are serving in the army should be retired is a cowardly surrender to a cry which should not have been heeded. The true policy for France was indicated in a very able report to the Senate by M. ALLOU. It recommended the simple rejection of the expulsion bill, for reasons which are equally cogent against the forcible retirement of the princes from the army.

The report points out that the republic has weathered much greater perils than Plon-Plon's placard without resorting to proscription, and it shows that the plots of pretenders abroad are quite as dangerous as at home. To punish certain citizens for their birth is a gross denial of republican equality, and to take extreme precautions against imaginary dangers is a sign of fatal weakness. But more especially the report warns the Senate that to yield to a policy of popular proscription is to encourage the most remorseless tyranny. The whole anti-pretender policy is merely an effort to revive the old Revolutionary terror of '93, and the worst symptom of the present political situation in France is the surrender of the FERRY Ministry to this spirit.

The Duc de Chartres has obeyed the law retiring him from the army, and issued a farewell order, appealing to his regiment loyally to support his successor, and to prove by their zeal, devotion, and obedience to law that his official relation to them had been inspired by honor and patriotism. There is much less reason to doubt the patriotism of the Orleans princes than that of their most rancorous opponents.

EDWIN BOOTH IN GERMANY.

MR. EDWIN BOOTH's success in Germany is altogether beyond that which any American actor, or probably any English-speaking actor, has ever received in a foreign country. It was his Hamlet which captivated the Germans, and it is not difficult to understand why. The character of the part, the delicacy and variety of the actor's interpretation of it, and a certain romantic glamour in which it is steeped, would be all most agreeable to German taste.

It is interesting to remark in the comments of the press that each critic was struck by a separate beauty in the presentation. Each string of the deftly swept harp especially charmed some sympathetic hearer, and the unreserved cordiality of the praise is striking and significant. To Mr. BOOTH personally the tribute must be exceedingly gratifying, while to his countrymen it is pleasant to know that so admirable an artist and so modest a gentleman has widely extended the fame of his country in a department of art in which America was supposed still to be a pupil, not a master.

A TRUTH WELL PUT

GOVERNOR SCHUYLER CROSBY, of Montana Territory, in his late Message to the Territorial Legislature, states a sound political truth with admirable point. In recommending a registry law to avoid the evils which are fostered by the present loose arrangements for voting in the Territory he says, "It is less a hardship that an honest voter should lose his vote than that a dishonest one should annul many honest votes by repeating."

CHARLES FENNO HOFFMAN

A REFERENCE in the Easy Chair of HARPER'S MAGAZINE to CHARLES FENNO HOFFMAN, a charming literary figure of forty years ago in New York, and the founder of the old Knickerbocker Magazine, has drawn from a correspondent at Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, a touching glimpse of the author whose career was so early and sadly clouded, but who is living still:

"He has been for many years, and is now—or was very recently—in the State Lunatic Hospital near this city. I used to see him quite often there. His insanity is of a harmless kind, I believe, and consists in the illusion that the air is full of spirits in actual bodily existence, and that they approach him as if to hurt him. He is free to go where he likes at most times, I understand, and does go off without an attendant, always into the country, avoiding people and roads, and in all weather. He is fully of middle height, his hair is grizzled, and rather long and straggling; his face and form are spare; his eyes bright and keen, but wandering; his figure erect, and his physical health strong. He is a striking and bizarre figure, striding along, a fur cap on his head, and a stout stick in his hand, with which he continually makes passes into the air to ward off the spirits when they approach too near. His wooden leg—or rather stump—does not seem to hinder his going anywhere. He returns of himself at night, and seems perfectly content. He has intervals of comparative lucidity, and is then a most interesting talker."

Mr HOFFMAN is now seventy-seven years old, and he is probably unknown to the new generation of readers. But the manliness of his character, the brightness of his mind, and his literary skill made him one of the most delightful writers of the Knickerbocker school.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

THE Boston Young Men's Christian Union provides a truly catholic and admirable series of entertainments during the winter. Not only are religious services held by clergymen of all denominations, but there are courses of pleasant lectures upon practical ethics, such as novel-reading, amusements, economy, and "talks" upon the political history of the United States, upon banking, upon travel and geography, physical training, photography, and elocution, with illustrated lectures.

These entertainments occupy several evenings in the week. They are the voluntary contribution of the most eminent and accomplished clergymen and citizens, and the public is cordially invited to attend with the members of the Union. To young men who are busy during the day such a resort, with its gymnasium and reading-rooms, is a most attractive club, and is but another striking illustration of that all-embracing Christian civilization which is constantly seeking to elevate and purify and educate and restrain.

To the same beneficent spirit we owe the Free Circulating Library in New York. Its annual report, which is just issued, shows a constant and marked increase of public interest in the enterprise. The number of persons constantly using the books during the year was about five thousand, and as the circulation of volumes was 71,840 and only eleven books were lost, it is a striking tribute to the care and honesty of the "patrons" of the library. To extend the benefit of the library, branches are needed, and they will be undoubtedly established as fast as the generous givers to all good works of the kind fully understand the situation.

AN AMERICAN STORY

THERE are certain careers which we call, and with just pride, peculiarly American. Their chief aspects are of course familiar. The country boy, trained in the district school, in the plain and orderly family home, and in the Sunday-school and church, comes to the city, and by energy, industry, sagacity, honesty, and intrinsic ability rises to opulence and influence, to general respect, public confidence, and honorable distinction. Illustrations of this characteristic American career will occur to every one who reads these words, but a graphic record of one of them which well represents all has lately fallen under our observation. It is a brief and modest account of the chief incidents in the life of a New York merchant, with extracts from his speeches, which he designed only for his grandchildren, but which has been privately printed for a few friends.

Yet as the extracts are from speeches in Congress and elsewhere, publicly reported and widely read when delivered, we do not feel that we invade unduly the privacy of the volume by speaking of it. It is the record of the life of Mr. S. B. CHITTENDEN, especially in relation to the war, and to the practical questions of finance and economy that followed it, when he acted and spoke both as a successful merchant and as a Representative in Congress. But the little work is mainly significant as an illustration of the patriotic intelligence of the American merchant, who, when the occasion calls, turns from the engrossing duties of his business to help form and lead public sentiment upon questions of great public policy, and to serve in Congress with the same energy and sagacity with which he has toiled in the counting-room.

Such a record does much to explain how a peaceful and trading country, with only the form of an army and navy, and long wholly unfamiliar with war, rose under every disadvantage, except the essential quality of its people, to the full height of a tremendous historical contest of arms, and pushed it steadily forward to complete victory in the field, with happy avoidance of the disastrous financial and social reaction that so often follows. It was because in every field and workshop and office and factory and counting-room were found not only patriotism and willingness, but the ability of the self-possessed and self-respecting and self-supporting citizen to turn from his peculiar vocation and adapt himself to the exigency, whether on the battle-field or in the Legislature or in the public meeting. It is as a vivid glimpse of a career which illustrates this American quality that this modest record and all similar stories will be prized by the historian of liberty.

PERSONAL.

An art critic was introducing one of his friends to a well-known New York sculptor. "This gentleman," he explained, looking at the sculptor, "is your true modern divinity—he makes men out of clay." "Yes," added the sculptor, slyly, "and he never throws mud at them."

—The late Dean STANLEY was shy when a boy. His aunt called him "the little sylph," his drill-sergeant at school exhorted him to "put on a bold, swaggering air, and don't look sheepish," and his school-fellows bullied him. But in manhood he became distinguished for his unrivalled social gifts. His wife, says his biographer, Dean BRADLEY, not only shared his friendships, sympathized with his work and aspirations, and developed to the utmost his capacity for social life, but exercised a "tender care for the health and comfort of one curiously incapable of taking care of himself, even in the most essential points of food and dress."

—A New York man of letters, whose praise recently was in all the reviews, exclaimed the other day to a friend: "I made a fool of myself this morning. They have been erecting a tasteful building for a firm of clothiers on Broadway, and the tenants have just moved in. As I am compelled to pass there every day, I have had some satisfaction in its general architectural effect. Judge, therefore, of my disgust this morning when I saw behind one of the immense plate-glass windows the notorious old sign, 'Pants to order.' As soon as I reached my office I wasted a sheet of paper and a two-cent stamp in an earnest appeal to the proprietor to substitute 'trousers,' or at least 'pantaloons.' Of course it will do no good, and I know that I made a fool of myself. But I couldn't help it."

—The King of Siam has again manifested the excellence of his literary taste by appointing Mr. FRANK VINCENT, Jun., the well-known author of The Land of the White Elephant, a Knight of the Royal Order of Busya Mala, and sending him an elaborately chased and embossed gold medal, and a diploma, surmounted by the regal arms, which expresses the devout wish that "the Power which is Supreme in the Universe may keep and guard" Mr. VINCENT, "and grant him happiness and prosperity." Our readers will remember that the same potentate recently honored another American author, Colonel T. W. KNOX, with the insignia of the Order of the White Elephant.

—JOHN DUNCAN, the celebrated Scotch weaver and botanist, whose life has been lately given to the public, carried his orthodoxy so far as to insist that the Catholics should be shot, since it was impossible to convert them. "You surely would not take the gun to them, JOHN?" asked a friend. "Should you not try preaching and reasoning with them?" "Weel, weel," replied JOHN, "but if they winna hear, what then? There's naething for't but shootin'."

—"GAMBETTA in Hades" is the heading of an article in the Paris Figaro. The dead statesman is represented as meeting M. THIERS: "My poor GAMBETTA, you here?" asks the latter—"you so young, so gay, so full of life, so exuberant." "Alas, yes," replies the other. "Appearances are deceitful. As with MIRABEAU, my head was the only good thing about me." The conversation then plunges into politics, and M. THIERS declares that the French Republic is atheistic: "Poor France! poor people! poor children! I beg pardon of my country for having been the godfather of the Republic." GAMBETTA having inquired where his friends are, is told that they are "there, in that dark path, not far from us, airing their ferocious humors or their monotonous dream. For myself," adds THIERS, "I live among a little group of reactionaries."

—DICKENS's biographers, Mr. FORSTER and Mr WARD, describe the last few weeks of his life as a cycle of gloom. But a gentleman who acted in private theatricals with the novelist exactly seven days before his death declares that on this occasion the author of Pickwick was the liveliest of his associates, and manifested an "infectious enjoyment."

—A Prime Minister can not please everybody, and Sir ROBERT PEEL, a Tory politician, publicly charges Mr GLADSTONE, in his temporary withdrawal to Cannes for his health, with having "deserted the helm of the vessel of state at the very moment when Parliament was going to meet, when cabinet councils ought to be held, and when the finances, owing to extravagance and mismanagement, are in a very unsettled state."

—A European in India who is accused of violating the law can be arrested, committed, tried, condemned, or acquitted only by European officials. The native magistrates don't like this, and complain that perfect equality is not guaranteed by British domination, although British domination professes to guarantee it. Lord RIPON, the Viceroy of India, proposes to take away the privilege, and has thereby invoked the wrath of thousands of Englishmen at home and abroad.

—There are plenty of etiquettes in the world, observes a foreign journalist—too many, most reasonable folk would say—but yet we feel inclined to suggest an addition to the number. We want it to be made an etiquette that a man who announces that he is seeking rest should be let alone. The room of the sick American statesman swarms with interviewers, but they can only be just a shade worse than the bulletin-makers, who will not let Mr GLADSTONE look down from a balcony on a carnival without recounting how showers of confetti—nasty comfits, part plaster, part flour, and part dyes—only excited him to boyish glee.

—In view of the alleged fact that dozens of amiable men are at this moment drifting into old bachelorhood for the want of a little help at the opportune moment, a young woman suggests the establishment of classes, both for men and girls, where the former can be taught the easiest methods of approaching the important subject, and the latter how best they may assist them.

—The natives of Burmah have developed an inordinate appetite for tobacco and for sugar. Men, women, and children use seven pounds of the weed per head a year, and for each mouthful of tea drunk many of them eat a mouthful of caked sugar. Even in India the consumption of tobacco is little more than one pound per head per annum.

—ARABI authorizes a reporter in Ceylon to "tell the English people I am content to remain here as their guest, to rest in peace while they carry out to its fullest extent the work I began in Egypt."

—It is now believed that at the time of the Phœnix Park murders Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH might have escaped with his life had he taken refuge in flight instead of remaining to protect his companion Mr BURKE, upon whose death the conspirators were intent.

—The Pall Mall Gazette finds it difficult to refrain from smiling at the commotion caused in Switzerland by the presence of a couple of young ladies—Miss BOOTH and her friend, of the Salvation Army. "The old spirit which burned SERVETUS still seems to linger in the city of CALVIN, but it has entered into and possessed the men who regarded themselves as the special representatives of free thought. Miss BOOTH may be a visionary and a fanatic, but she is, after all, an English subject, and it is to be hoped that our representative at Geneva will do all he can to see that the rights of our countrymen in Switzerland are not wantonly interfered with."

—A late writer suggests that in the matter of sending valentines we might return with pride to the custom of two hundred years ago, when SAMUEL PEPYS's wife received from her admirers "half a dozen pair of gloves and a pair of silk stockings and garters for her valentines"—to quote from that old journalist's diary.

—A new street in Paris, occupying in part the site of a house and garden belonging to ALFRED STEVENS, is to bear that celebrated artist's name.

—Mr G. F. WATTS, R.A., advises his country-women that extreme tightness of dress is at all times a very hazardous experiment. "Even beautiful arms, [illegible] very tightly incased, look not a little like sausages. But it is always to be remembered that folds, with their infinite cha[illegible] of shape, light, and shadow, are more beautiful than anything, excepting that perfection of form which is rarely found."

—The following letter from ROBERT BURNS was made public for the first time a few days ago, at the annual celebration at Sheffield in honor of the poet: "Sir,—The language of refusal is to me the most difficult language on earth, and you are the man of the world, excepting one of right honorable designation, to whom it gives me the greatest pain to hold such language. My brother has already got money, and shall want nothing in my power to enable him to fulfill his engagement with you; but to be security on so large a scale, even for a brother, is what I dare not do, [illegible] were in such circumstances of life as that the worst that [illegible] happen could not greatly injure me. AMONG THE FEEJEEANS.

THE picture we present of THAKOMBAU, pronounced probably the last of Feejeean kings, as he was the greatest, was taken in Levuka, the capital of Feejee. It represents a grand specimen of native manhood.

THAKOMBAU was the grandson of NA VITIAZ, chief of the island of Mbau, and son of TANOA. His grandfather commenced the work of subjugation upon islands contiguous to his own, which was so well carried on by TANOA that at the time of his death (1829) he had established his supremacy over the principal islands of the group, and left to THAKOMBAU a heritage of conquest and war. All Feejee acknowledged his rule after many years of savage warfare. His fights by sea and land, with all the strange romances and terrible situations of cannibal warfare, may yet find a historian. When they do, THAKOMBAU will find a place by the side of other romantic native warriors, who, after subduing their own peers and their subjects, came in contact with the white man's civilization, and losing at last their grand courage in contending against the vexations of English diplomacy, which stopped short of actual war, but pushed its victim to the extremity of despair, surrendered in sorrow the actual ruling power into English hands, keeping the empty honor and title of King, with a liberal allowance to maintain the show of royalty.

THAKOMBAU, driven to desperation by intriguing whites and warlike neighboring tribes, offered to England the sovereignty of the Islands in 1858, with the free-simple of 100,000 acres of land, on condition that England should pay the American claim of £9000 for alleged injuries to their consul. Colonel SMYTH, R.A., was sent to report on the advisability of annexation, which he reported against. Then an attempt was made to 1871 by some enterprising Englishmen to form a constitutional government, with THAKOMBAU as King. They kept it up for three years, but only succeeded in running the government largely in debt, without benefiting either whites or natives. The English government by this time saw that the Feejees were valuable to complete their chain of ports between a possible Panama Canal and Sydney, China, and India, and took active measures to obtain them. This they easily accomplished, and the King ceded his islands to Great Britain, being allowed to keep his ancestral island of Mbau as a residence, with an annuity of $20,000 a year from the English government.

In appearance THAKOMBAU was very striking. The old warrior was straight as an arrow, and over six feet in height, with that full rounded and muscular development which characterizes the natives of most of the South-sea Islands, and his massive features, set in the frame-work of white hair and flowing white beard, gave an air of majesty to his person that distinguished him at once among any number of whites or natives. In 1854 he embraced the religion brought over to Feejee from the Tonga Islands by the Wesleyan missionaries, and after that did all in his power to suppress cannibalism.

THAKOMBAU'S son TIMOTHY, who might be called "a gilded youth" of the South-sea Islands, is a handsome specimen of the young aristocracy of the Feejees. He has a fine yacht of about a hundred and forty tons, in which he cruises as far as Sydney, Australia, every year or two, and makes frequent excursions to the several islands of the group. TIMOTHY is not unmindful of the situation in which his father placed all the other Feejee chiefs when he was prevailed upon to give up his island kingdom to British rule, as the following anecdote will show: At the banquet given by the English to King THAKOMBAU after his acceptance of their terms of annexation there was invited a number of the great chiefs of Samoa, with a view to impress them with the new importance given to the King, and to make them anxious to give up their islands to the English on the same terms. They were taken there on an English man-of-war, and treated with great consideration and respect. One of them sat by TIMOTHY at the feast, and when the orator of the occasion said, "You great chiefs of Samoa now see what King THAKOMBAU gets by his friendship for England," TIMOTHY replied,

"Yes, he gets £4000 a year, but what do we other chiefs get?" The Samoans are very bright and very politic, and can the advantages at once which they would gain by a similar treaty. The result is that they are at present free from the bane of foreign rule and taxes.

The native dress of the Feejee woman is the lava-lava, which consists of a cloth made from the bark of the paper-mulberry-tree, called tapa. This is wound around the loins two or three times, the folds falling to the knee, and is fastened by a twist which the smallest girl or boy can make in the twinkling of an eye, and yet no white person can accomplish. Their native grace is such that even in this scanty apparel they never appear to American eyes vulgar or unbecomingly dressed. They only appear ridiculous when dressed in civilized clothes, with shoes and stockings.

The native house which we present stands in the English Governor's grounds in Levuka as a specimen guest house, and is often used by him for the entertainment of visitors. These houses are very cleverly constructed, without the use of bolts, pins, nails, or other fastenings, except sennit, a cord braided from the fibre of cocoa-nut husks, and are thatched to the thickness of eight or ten inches with the leaves of the wild sugar-cane.

Levuka is the only town of any importance in the Feejee Islands. It has a low reef harbor of difficult access, which precludes very insecure anchorage against anything like a hurricane. The street along the beach is wide and macadamized. Business places and dwellings indiscriminately line its entire length. It is a succession of small cottages, which, backed by the cocoa-nut trees, towering far above the denser foliage of the banana, the guava, the mango, and the dozens of other fruit-bearing trees or shrubs, makes it look like a beautiful and real haven of rest on you anchor in the harbor after a voyage upon the interminable Pacific. The more pretentious houses are built on the mountain-sides above the town, and the picturesque house of the native is seen everywhere, surrounded by the dark green foliage of their bread-fruits, banana, cocoa-nuts, and other fruits which go so far to make up their daily bill of fare.

The white settlers in Feejee at the end of 1876 numbered 1849. Levuka is the residence of fourfifths of them. Those who do not reside there are engaged in planting and trading in the interior, drawing their supplies from Levuka. It is doubtful whether there are any more whites in Feejee to-day than there were in 1874. The planters complained that they were supervised and tyrannized over to such an extent by a despotic, who applied all the worst features of a pro[illegible]-monde government, to their great [illegible] and discomfort, that it was impossible to make planting profitable. A change has been recently made by promoting the unpopular Governor to be Governor of New Zealand.

THREE TIMES A MINISTER.

The nomination of Colonel John W. Foster, of Indiana, as United States Minister to Spain, is understood to have been made at the instance of Secretary Fish. Mr. Foster, with special reference to naturalization and other questions pending between the two countries, with which his experience in Mexico and St. Petersburg made him familiar. Colonel Foster was born in Evansville, Indiana, in 1834. He received a college education and was admitted to the bar, and was practicing law in his native city when the war broke out. He immediately entered the service, was commissioned an officer of volunteers, and saw an unusual amount of hard fighting. He attained the full rank of Colonel, commanded a brigade of cavalry in Hascman's expedition to East Tennessee, and subsequently commanded a division in that region. In 1873 he was sent as Minister to Mexico, in 1880 to Russia, and now goes to Madrid.

A FASHIONABLE DAIRY MAID.

Among the brilliant coterie of beauties that surrounded the Prince of Wales at Brighton in the early part of the present century was Lady Haggerstone, whose charms had at first sight attracted the admiration of the amorous Florizel. But not content with the general admiration which his Royal Highness was disposed to grant to all pretty women, her ladyship was ambitious to completely captivate the heart of the heir-apparent. Accordingly a fête champêtre was announced to come off at her pretty little villa near the Spa, and her ladyship was determined to charm the Prince by assuming a rustic dress that would have satisfied the taste of a Watteau. At her residence she had a miniature farm-yard and three little Aldermen. When the Prince with his friends and attendants had arrived, the fair hostess came forward from a side wicket, dressed as a milkmaid, for the purpose of making a syllabub for the Prince. She had a silver pail in one hand and an ornamental stool in the other. Thus equipped, she tripped along, with ribbons flying from her tiny little milking hat that hung on one side of her graceful head, and the smallest hole upon that below her laced stomacher, till she came opposite his Royal Highness, to whom she dropped a carefully studied bewitching rustic courtesy. Then passing lightly over the beautifully plaited straw, her tucked-up gown showing her neat ankle dressed in colored stockings, she placed her stool and pail conveniently for use. Leaning against the flank of one of the crescent-looking of the Aldermen, she was about to begin [illegible] pretty task; but not relishing this new [illegible] the on[illegible] at once commenced [illegible]ing out, [illegible] pail, milkmaid, and then [illegible] Lady Haggerstone rose, covered with confusion, and beat a hast[illegible] into he little dairy, whence she did no[illegible] again that day.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

The death of Mr Stephens removes one of the few conspicuous men remaining from the civil war, and one who was a striking and curious example of the effect upon genius and character of the conditions prevailing in the South before the war. He was certainly a man of original force, of extraordinary talent, and possessed of qualities which ought to have made of him a successful leader and a statesman of real value. But he will be remembered more by his eccentricities than by his attainments or achievements, and he loved rather for his personal kindliness than for real services rendered to the community in which he bore so prominent a part. Although Mr Stephens died in advanced years—he was born in 1812—he was afflicted from childhood with feebleness and disease, which nothing but his splendid resolution could have overcome. In addition to this obstacle to success in the public career which he chose, he had to contend with extreme poverty, and with the almost entire lack of adequate intellectual training.

Yet he may be said to have passed his days in legislative bodies. Elected to the Georgia Legislature in 1836, at the age of twenty-four, he was steadily re-elected, until in 1843 he was transferred to the House of Representatives, where he remained until 1859. During the war of the rebellion he was Vice-President of the Confederate States and President of the Senate. After the war he was for eight years in the House of Representatives, ranking in all thirty-five years of legislative service. His gifts were unquestionable. Especially as earlier life his eloquence was fervent, persuasive, and sympathetic, while he developed marked skill in debate. His energy was exhaustless, his knowledge of human nature varied and extensive, and his mastery of parliamentary tactics almost unequalled. At the same time his grasp of constitutional law, his capacity for plausible reasoning, his ingenious mode of presenting his arguments, and his promptness in accepting accomplished facts, made him easily a leader of the party with which he cast in his fortunes. Had he been unhampered by the conditions, political and moral, which surrounded him, there is little room for doubt that he would have won great distinction; but as an his misfortune to be in servitude, unconscious but complete, to the terrible institution which determined the political career of every public man in the South, and which interposed a barrier that none succeeded in overthrowing or passing.

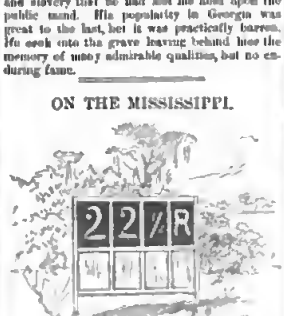
Mr Stephens was an ardent lover of the abstract principles which underlie the American government. He took a sincere and unfeigned delight in their study. Liberty in its most democratic form was his ideal, and, excluding the negro race, the rights of man and of each community of men were the objects of his most enthusiastic devotion. For the Constitution, as the embodiment of the ideas of the Revolution, the revealed gospel of democracy, the sacred instrument devised by the inspired political fathers, he had something akin to worship, and there is nowhere in our literature more acute appreciation of its manifold force or more eloquent praise of its central idea than in his writings. But if one can imagine the fate of Jefferson compelled to defend the institution which, in contemplating and remembering that "God is just, made him tremble for his country," one may form some conception of the terrible failure to which the brilliant Georgian disciple of Jefferson was doomed.

At every step Mr Stephens was baffled by the conditions which slavery imposed. He entered public life as a Whig, but was forced to support the annexation of Texas which Clay, the great Whig leader, opposed, and was gradually compelled to join the Democratic party, from which many of his most earnest convictions repelled him. He was unquestionably a lover of the Union—the constantly growing superstructure based on the Constitution which he revered; but the necessity of finding some standing ground for slavery drove him to the theory of the right of any State to secede from the Union—a theory which made of the most solemn political bond a rope of sand, and of the very name of Union a mockery. Mr. Stephens's desperate attempt to find a safe middle course in the specious but weak and absurd doctrines of Stephen A. Douglas, one one of the most interesting, as well as one of the most melancholy, features of his public career.

When all his dreams of compromise were rudely interrupted by the ripening of the secession plots, made by men who accomplished events instead of accepting them when accomplished, Mr. Stephens protested, but yielded. He not only consented to take part in the Confederate government, but he had the temerity to defend it and the principle on which it was based, and to declare that "slavery was the corner-stone" of the new civilization." It is of the irony of fate that this announcement did more than any utterance from the Union side could do to prevent the Confederacy from gaining sympathy abroad, where sympathy was absolutely essential to it, and that the unprejudiced love of that liberty which he had praised so eloquently was turned by his words to implacable hatred of the cause in which he enlisted. And in many ways Mr Stephens suffered inconsistently from his one fatal weakness. The leaders of the rebellion utterly distrusted him. He was almost without influence in the councils of the Confederacy, and before the close of the struggle was driven into retirement. The officers of the Union army found him alone in his deserted mansion, surrounded by a half dozen of his slaves, a saddened spectator of the general ruin which he had resisted at first, but had finally aided to bring about.

After the war Mr Stephens re-entered public life, and did all that he could to restore harmony between the North and the South. But though naturally a conspicuous figure in the House where he had once been a leader, he was comparatively without influence, and was regarded rather with curiosity and interest than with respect. He had so hopelessly committed himself to the absurd nobleness by which he had defended secession and slavery that he had lost his hold upon the public mind. His popularity in Georgia was great to the last, but it was practically barren. He took into the grave leaving behind him the memory of many admirable qualities, but no enduring fame.

ON THE MISSISSIPPI.



PILOTS' SIGNAL—WATER SIX FEET—RISING.

On his way down the Mississippi to New Orleans our artist found abundant material for his pencil in the picturesque scenes presented at almost every point along the shores of that majestic river. He was very much struck with the landings at night to take on board sacks of corn. In one night four of these landings were made within a distance of five miles. As soon as one landing was left, signal lights would be seen at other places, either below or across the river, which were answered until the cargo was complete.

The planter's farm being frequently at some distance from the river, the sacks of corn are brought by wagon to the bank, and there piled on a board flooring, and covered with tarpaulin or canvas to protect them from the weather. A watchman is stationed a little way up the river to signal approaching boats, and on being answered by the hoarse whistle, he rides back to the landing in order to point out its position.

While our artist was sketching the floating house, appropriately called "Old Reliable," the owner made his appearance, accompanied by two cats, and after taking a survey of the sketcher, called out in cheery tones, "Hello, stranger! won't you walk in and take something? Where's that 'ere flood comin' down from Cairo? I'm well fixed, ain't I? Guess I've got the bulge on the wet this time."

In the distance of the view of the river-bank, near the city of Memphis, is shown the improvements made by the government in cutting down the trees for a certain distance from the water, and hauling them away, in order to prevent "sawyers" and "snags" in the channel. In the foreground may be seen the tangled growth of wood not yet reached by the improvement.

The outline cut at the head of this article shows the government signal which informs pilots of the state of the water. These signal boards, which are large enough to be visible at a considerable distance, are posted at intervals along the river-bank.

LONG ISLAND SHORE IN WINTER.

People of leisure are a growing quantity in our population. As a rule, this class-being of the sea and generation, it has not as yet learned how to live in positive idleness. This is an art which in time only will come to the descendants of those who have been "let in on the ground-floor." The second generation fancies it knows how to live. It contents in constant bustle and movement, and in calling attention to itself in petty paragraphs in the daily press. One of the forms which it has recently assumed is an affected fondness for the sea-shore during the winter. This season the movement has not been as pronounced as in a year or two past. The gloomy Canadian Weather has injected a meteorological skeleton into the sea-side closet.

Permanent residents by the sea will not greet at this growing fashion. Intermittent visits break the monotony of that the dullest season of the year. Moreover, there is about these opulent hints of passage an element of the picturesque in manners, costume, and accessories which, as the advertisers say, "supplies a want long felt." They affect bizarre and novel surprises. On the train of one of our sea-board railways a few weeks since was a lady with several children. Accompanying her was a maid for herself and one for each child; in addition, as director general of the detachment, a person dressed in the full costume of a Sister of Charity. These was in this originality and stylish picturesque novelty. A vivid contrast to the luminous component of this little group was presented, as the train crossed the head-waters of numerous little bays, [illegible] figures shivering in the cold [illegible] jabbed for eels through holes cut in the ice. Of the [illegible] race of the red spearer was possibly the happier. He at least was free from the thousand and one complications and annoyances of an uncertain mental nature. In his locality the eel-spearer, moreover, is by no means a person of inconsequence. He owns a comfortable house, he is the possessor of a weatherly boat stiff as a church in a breeze, and so long as chains and pots are plenty, and he has the wherewithal to pay doctors' bills, his cares are few and insignificant. It is a noticeable fact that nowhere is the doctor more frequently in request than among our [illegible]ughers population. This arises from a total disregard of simple sanitary laws, and their large families of children—the last possibly a counterpoise to the melancholy monotony of constantly jabbing for eels, or the wearisome tonging of the contemplative clam. It is not an infrequent incident for a grandfather to be in momentary expectation of becoming once more a father. He may be a widower twice, or even thrice; he may be bedridden and helpless—indeed, reduced to the condition of a vegetable—yet so long as there is life in the lively he is sufficiently equipped for a fresh matrimonial venture.

In tenacity and vigor the crow of the sea-board is equally noticeable. This bird, indeed, has never had justice done him. Scientists have devoted a lifetime to the study of the soft and the more obscure forms of vegetable and animal life; the habits and wisdom of the crow are worthy of as close observation. One of this species, now marked by white with age, has visited the shore, near the residence of the writer, as every recurring season since the youth of men now far advanced in years. He is known from the absence of two toes of his right foot; his tracks on the soft sand of the beach establish his identity. Moreover, his voice would betray him; it is like that of a very aged person. He is one of the few crows that can count three or more. Young birds of the species may be lured within gunshot by three men going into a field, the subsequent withdrawal of two, the third remaining to ambush. This is a problem the inexperienced crow can not solve. The venerable crow in question has not within the memory of man ever been deceived by this ruse. All efforts to capture, shoot, or poison him have failed.

The exterminating war waged against crows by agriculturists is on a plane with their forecasts of the weather, based on the changes of the moon. Where the crow destroys one full of corn, he more than compensates for it in the vast quantities of insects which he devours. Moreover, he is the natural scavenger of the sea-board. It is a pleasant little habit of the longshoreman, when a domestic animal dies, to throw the carcass into the waters of the bay near at hand. It drifts with the wind either to the one shore or the other. Even when floating it is covered with crows enjoying the banquet. Each day the birds increase in number. Now and again they are caught in a beam blow difficult for them to face. They also on these occasions—the skill of an expert navigator in extricating themselves from the perilous incident to a long flight across the wind-swept water.

So long as crows have plenty to eat they remain interesting birds, but, when food is scarce, proximity to their roost renders life indeed not worth living. A famished crow, next to a man who never tires of relating his sporting adventures, is one of the most depressing forms of animal life. In the one case the sight of a gun shows the nuisance, while in the second the exhibition of that weapon only arouses him to fiercer outbursts of garrulity.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

VENTILATION IN WINTER.

How to get good ventilation, either in winter or summer, is a question of importance, and sometimes a difficult question, and its difficulties are increased by the darkening of counsel of those who sometimes write about it.

The commonest remark we see made about ventilation is that if you open a window from the top and the bottom the cold air will flow in below and the warm escape above, and that presently all the air will be changed in this way.

Now this is true in one case, and one only—namely, when the outside air is but slightly colder than the inside. Try the experiment on a cold winter day, the air will rush in from both above and below. Try it on a warm summer day, when the air within and without is at the same temperature; there will be indeed no inward change of air, but not any perceptible movement, inward or outward, unless the breeze actually blows through the house. Even a small apartment is not self-ventilating always. Large buildings, as halls of Congress, theatres, churches, require complicated machinery for forcing pure air in and for expelling the foul, but this branch of the subject need not be discussed here. How shall we best supply pure air to an ordinary living room?

The leading points about the winter ventilation of an ordinary dwelling house or apartment are but two:

1. A regulated supply of pure air from without should be provided.

2. This cold air should be introduced without creating draughts.

In all ordinary cases more or less cold air will come in, whether you wish it or not. The motive power, the inward draught, is due to the fact that the inside of the house is warmer than the outside air, so that there is always a strong rising current of air which escapes through the chimney, while the air forces its way in through nearly all parts of the building, even through the walls and the roof. All of the materials of an ordinary house, except the iron work and the glass windows, are pervious to air, and more so than is commonly supposed. Pettenkofer shows that one man blew out a candle through a dry brick, if the experiment be managed so as to concentrate the escaping breath at one point. A square foot of the ordinary lath-and-plaster ceiling allows the passage of one and a half cubic feet per hour of air at 72°, if the air about be at 40°. Look carefully at any old ceiling, and you can see every joist and lath decay upon it in marks a little whiter than the rest of the ceiling. The marks show that the wood and the plaster together are less pervious than the plaster alone which has been turned to a darker tint by the long-continued straining out of the impurities of the air which passes through it.

Now in what way are we to introduce pure cold air without creating draughts? If an open fire is used, we shall seldom need any special contrivance; the open fire draws in air by every opening—through door and window chinks, through key-holes, through the walls themselves. Only be sure that the air admitted comes by a clean route, not an unclean one, as when it passes through badly ventilated halls, or from a ground surface that may be foul.

The open fire is a great ventilator. But stoves, furnaces, and hot pipes draw in much less air from without, and provide much less chance for its exit; and when these are used we shall be the better off for some opening specially provided to admit the outer air. "Natural" ventilation, like many other natural arrangements, has great faults; it sends the air creeping along the floor to chill our feet. If we make the artificial opening near the floor, a draught upon our feet is created; if we make it near the ceiling, then there is a draught upon the head. How shall we admit cold air in such a way that there shall be no draught at all? By making the air current ascend as it enters, rising like a fountain, and then falling like spray until it is warmed. This is easily accomplished by either of two simple devices.

The first is to fit a piece of board three inches wide into the bottom of the window. Shut down the lower sash upon the edge of this board, and put up the upper sash; that will leave a narrow chink, just three inches deep, between the two sashes, at the middle of the window. Through this opening the air will pass in, and will be forced directly upward, like a fountain, toward the ceiling, whence it will diffuse itself through the room without striking any one. In very cold weather, either remove the board and make the window tight, or have some narrow lids attached to the top bar of the bottom sash, which you can turn over, and so cover the openings when necessary. If you have to guard against smoke or dust without, a little cotton may be placed between the sashes so as to filter the incoming air; the cotton should be changed often.

The second device consists in making an opening over the door or window into the outer air; in this put a piece of board with the inner end pointing upward. The incoming air is thus sent upward as in the case just described. The board should have cheeks, or side pieces, to prevent the air from escaping sidewise and downward; it should not be put too high, else the cold air might rebound directly from the ceiling downward, and it should clear the heads of the occupants. A good height is about seven feet from the floor, unless you chance to have visitors who are taller than this. The "Sherringham valve" is this contrivance made in iron, and provided with strings to regulate the proper degree of opening for the valve.

Still another simple and good contrivance, where a stove is used (though it is a rather unsightly one), is to bring a tin pipe about three inches in diameter from the outer air to a point nearly but not quite over the stove and near the ceiling. The cool air comes in through this, and is warmed and dispersed by the rising current of hot air from the stove. By using either of these devices the draught will be avoided, and one may be sure of getting good ventilation during the coldest weather, if he will pay its necessary price in fuel.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

THE THREE STRANGERS.

By THOMAS HARDY,

AUTHOR OF "FAR FROM THE MADDING CROWD," "A LAODICEAN," ETC.

II

This time the knock was faint and hesitating.

The company seemed scared; the shepherd looked with consternation toward the entrance, and it was with some effort that he resisted his alarmed wife's deprecatory glance, and uttered for the third time the welcoming words, "Walk in!"

The door was gently opened, and another man stood upon the mat. He, like those who had preceded him, was a stranger. This time it was a short, small personage, of fair complexion, and dressed in a decent suit of dark clothes.

"Can you tell me the way to—" he began, when, gazing round the room to observe the nature of the company amongst whom he had fallen, his eyes lighted on the stranger in cinder-gray. It was just at the instant when the latter, who had thrown his mind into his song with such a will that he scarcely heeded the interruption, silenced all whispers and inquiries by bursting into his third verse:

> "To-morrow is my working day,
> Simple shepherds all—
> To-morrow is a working day for me:
> For the farmer's sheep is slain, and the lad who did it ta'en,
> And on his soul may God ha' mer-cy!"

The stranger in the chimney-corner, waving cups with the singer so heartily that his mead splashed over on the hearth, repeated in his bass voice as before:

> "And on his soul may God ha' mer-cy!"

All this time the third stranger had been standing in the doorway. Finding now that he did not come forward or go on speaking, the guests particularly regarded him. They noticed to their [illegible] that he stood before them the picture of [illegible] terror—his [illegible] trembling, his hand [illegible] the [illegible] latch by which he [illegible] himself rattled audibly; his white lips [illegible] and his [illegible] fixed on the merry officer [illegible] in the middle of the room. A moment [illegible] and he had turned, closed the door, [illegible]

"What a man can it be?" said the shepherd.

The rest, between the awfulness of their late discovery and the odd conduct of this third visitor, looked as if they knew not what to think, and said nothing. Instinctively they withdrew further and further from the grim gentleman in their midst—whom some of them seemed to take for the Prince of Darkness himself—till they formed a remote circle, an empty space of floor being left between them and him:

"—— circulus, cujus centrum diabolus."

The room was so silent—though there were more than twenty people in it—that nothing could be heard but the patter of the rain against the window-shutters, accompanied by the occasional hiss of a stray drop that fell down the chimney into the fire, and the steady puffing of the man in the corner, who had now resumed his pipe of long clay.

The stillness was unexpectedly broken. The distant sound of a gun reverberated through the air, apparently from the direction of the county town.

"Be jiggered!" cried the stranger who had sung the song, jumping up.

"What does that mean?" asked several.

"A prisoner escaped from the jail—that's what it means."

All listened. The sound was repeated, and none of them spoke but the man in the chimney-corner, who said, quietly, "I've often been told that in this county they fire a gun at such times; but I never heard it till now."

"I wonder if it is my man?" murmured the personage in cinder-gray.

"Surely it is!" said the shepherd, involuntarily. "And surely we've seen him! That little man who looked in at the door by now, and quivered like a leaf when he seed ye and heard your song!"

"His teeth chattered, and the breath went out of his body," said the dairyman.

"And his heart seemed to sink within him like a stone," said Oliver Giles.

"And he bolted as if he'd been shot at," said the hedge-carpenter.

"True—his teeth chattered, and his heart seemed to sink, and he bolted as if he'd been shot at," slowly summed up the man in the chimney-corner.

"I didn't notice it," remarked the grim songster.

"We were all a-wondering what made him run off in such a fright," faltered one of the women against the wall, "and now 'tis explained."

The firing of the alarm gun went on at intervals, low and sullenly, and their suspicions became a certainty. The sinister gentleman in cinder-gray roused himself. "Is there a constable here?" he asked, in thick tones. "If so, let him step forward."

The engaged man of fifty stepped quavering out of the corner, his betrothed beginning to sob on the back of the chair.

"You are a sworn constable?"

"I be, sir."

"Then pursue the criminal at once, with assistance, and bring him back here. He can't have gone far."

"I will, sir, I will—when I've got my staff. I'll go home and get it, and come sharp here, and start in a body."

"Staff! Never mind your staff; the man'll be gone."

"But I can't do nothing without my staff—can I, William, and John, and Charles Jake? No; for there's the king's royal crown a painted on en in yaller and gold, and the lion and the unicorn, so as when I raise en up and hit my prisoner, 'tis made a lawful blow thereby. I wouldn't 'tempt to take up a man without my staff—no, not I. If I hadn't the law to gie me courage, why, instead o' my taking up him, he might take up me!"

"Now, I'm a king's man myself, and can give you [illegible] enough for this," said the formidable [illegible] in cinder-gray. "Now, then, all of ye, be ready. Have ye any lanterns?"

"Yes—have ye any lanterns?—I demand it," said the constable.

"And the rest of you able-bodied—"

"Able-bodied men—yes—the rest of ye," said the constable.

"Have you some good stout staves and pitchforks—"

"Staves and pitchforks—in the name o' the law. And take 'em in yer hands and go in quest, and do as we in authority tell ye."

Thus aroused, the men prepared to give chase. The evidence was, indeed, though circumstantial, so convincing that but little argument was needed to show the shepherd's guests that after what they had seen it would look very much like connivance if they did not instantly pursue the unhappy third stranger, who could not as yet have gone more than a few hundred yards over such uneven country.

A shepherd is always well provided with lanterns; and lighting these hastily, and with hurdle-stakes in their hands, they poured out of the door, taking a direction along the crest of the hill, away from the town, the rain having fortunately a little abated.

Disturbed by the noise, or possibly by unpleasant dreams of her baptism, the child who had been christened began to cry heart-brokenly in the room overhead. These notes of grief came down through the chinks of the floor to the ears of the women below, who jumped up one by one, and seemed glad of the excuse to ascend and comfort the baby, for the incidents of the last half-hour greatly oppressed them. Thus in the [illegible] of two or three minutes the room on the [illegible] floor was deserted quite.

But it was not for long. Hardly had the sound of footsteps died away when a man returned round the corner of the house from the [illegible] the pursuers had taken. Peeping in at the door, and seeing nobody there, he entered leisurely. It was the stranger of the chimney-corner, who had gone out with the rest. The motive of his return was shown by his helping himself to a cut piece of skimmer-cake that lay on a ledge beside where he had sat, and which he had apparently forgotten to take with him. He also poured out half a cup more mead from the quantity that remained, ravenously eating and drinking these as he stood. He had not finished when another figure came in just as quietly—the stranger in cinder-gray.

"Oh! you here?" said the latter, smiling. "I thought you had gone to help in the capture." And this speaker also revealed the object of his return by looking solicitously round for the fascinating mug of old mead.

"And I thought you had gone," said the other, continuing his skimmer-cake, with some effort.

"Well, on second thoughts, I felt there were enough without me," said the first, confidentially; "and such a night as it is, too! Besides, 'tis the business o' the government to take care of its criminals—not mine."

"True; so it is. And I felt as you did, that there were enough without me."

"I don't want to break my limbs running over the humps and hollows of this wild country."

"Nor I neither, between you and me."

"These shepherd people are used to it—simple-minded souls, you know, stirred up to anything in a moment. They'll have him ready for me before the morning, and no trouble to me at all."

"They'll have him, and we shall have saved ourselves all labor in the matter."

"True, true. Well, my way is to Casterbridge; and 'tis as much as my legs will do to take me that far. Going the same way?"

"No, I am sorry to say. I have to get home over there" (he nodded indefinitely to the right), "and I feel as you do, that it is quite enough for my legs to do before bed-time."

The other had by this time finished the mead in the mug, after which, shaking hands at the door, and wishing each other well, they went their several ways.

In the mean time the company of pursuers had reached the end of the hog's-back elevation which dominated this part of the coomb. They had decided on no particular plan of action; and finding that the man of the baleful trade was no longer in their company, they seemed quite unable to form any such plan now. They descended in all directions down the hill, and straightway several of the party fell into the snare set by Nature for all misguided midnight ramblers over this lower cretaceous formation. The "lanchets," or flint slopes, which belted the escarpment at intervals of a dozen yards, took the less cautious ones unawares, and losing their footing on the rubbly steep, they slid sharply downward, the lanterns rolling from their hands to the bottom, and there lying on their sides till the horn was scorched through.

When they had again gathered themselves together, the shepherd, as the man who knew the country best, took the lead, and guided them round these treacherous inclines. The lanterns, which seemed rather to dazzle their eyes and warn the fugitive than to assist them in the exploration, were extinguished, due silence was observed, and in this more rational order they plunged into the vale. It was a grassy, briery, moist channel, affording some shelter to any person who had sought it; but the party perambulated it in vain, and ascended on the other side. Here they wandered apart, and after an interval closed together again to report progress. At the second time of closing in they found themselves near a lonely ash, the single tree on this part of the upland, probably sown there by a passing bird some hundred years before. And here, standing a little to one side of the trunk, as motionless as the trunk itself, appeared the man they were in quest of, his outline being well defined against the sky beyond. The band noiselessly drew up and faced him.

"Your money or your life!" said the constable, sternly, to the still figure.

"No, no," whispered John Pitcher. "'Tisn't our side ought to say that. That's the doctrine of vagabonds like him, and we be on the side of the law."

"Well, well," replied the constable, impatiently; "I must say something, mustn't I? and if you had all the weight o' this undertaking upon your mind, perhaps you'd say the wrong thing too.—Prisoner at the bar, surrender, in the name of the Fath—the Crown, I mane!"

The man under the tree seemed now to notice them for the first time, and giving them no opportunity whatever for exhibiting their courage, he strolled slowly toward them. He was, indeed, the little man, the third stranger; but his trepidation had in a great measure gone.

"Well, travellers," he said, "did I hear ye speak to me?"

"You did: you've got to come and be our prisoner at once," said the constable. "We arrest ye on the charge of not biding in Casterbridge jail in a decent proper manner to be hung to-morrow morning. Neighbors, do your duty, and seize the culpet!"

On hearing the charge the man seemed enlightened, and, saying not another word, resigned himself with preternatural civility to the search party, who, with their staves in their hands, surrounded him on all sides, and marched him back toward the shepherd's cottage.

It was eleven o'clock by the time they arrived. The light shining from the open door, a sound of men's voices within, proclaimed to them as they approached the house that some new events had arisen in their absence. On entering they discovered the shepherd's living-room to be invaded by two officers from Casterbridge jail, and a well-known magistrate who lived at the [illegible] try [illegible] of the escape having [illegible] gen[illegible]

"[illegible]," said the constable, "I have brought back your man—not without risk and danger; [illegible] one must do [illegible]. He is inside this [illegible] of [illegible] who have lent me useful aid, considering their ignorance of Crown work. Men, bring forward your prisoner." And the third stranger was led to the light.

"Who is this?" said one of the officials.

"The man," said the constable.

"Certainly not," said the other turnkey; and the first corroborated his statement.

"But how can it be otherwise?" asked the constable. "Or why was he so terrified at sight o' the singing instrument of the law?" Here he related the strange behavior of the third stranger on entering the house.

"Can't understand it," said the officer, coolly. "All I know is that it is not the condemned man. He's quite a different character from this one—a gauntish fellow, with dark hair and eyes, rather good-looking, and with a musical bass voice that if you heard it once you'd never mistake as long as you lived."

"Why, souls—'twas the man in the chimney-corner!"

"Hey—what?" said the magistrate, coming forward, after inquiring particulars from the shepherd in the background. "Haven't you got the man, after all?"

"Well, sir," said the constable, "he's the man we were in search of, that's true; and yet he's not the man we were in search of. For the man we were in search of was not the man we wanted, sir, if you understand my every-day way; for 'twas the man in the chimney-corner."

"A pretty kettle of fish altogether!" said the magistrate. "You had better start for the other man at once."

The prisoner now spoke for the first time. The mention of the man in the chimney-corner seemed to have moved him as nothing else could do. "Sir," he said, stepping forward to the magistrate, "take no more trouble about me. The time is come when I may as well speak. I have done nothing; my crime is that the condemned man is my brother. Early this afternoon I left home at Anglebury to tramp it all the way to Casterbridge jail to bid him farewell. I was benighted, and called here to rest and ask the way. When I opened the door I saw before me the very man, my brother, that I thought to see in the condemned cell at Casterbridge. He was in this chimney-corner; and jammed close to him, so that he could not have got out if he had tried, was the executioner who'd come to take his life, singing a song about it, and not knowing that it was his victim who was close by, joining in to save appearances. My brother looked a glance of agony at me, and I knew he meant, 'Don't reveal what you see; my life depends on it.' I was so terror-struck that I could hardly stand, and not knowing what I did, I turned and hurried away."

The narrator's manner and tone had the stamp of truth, and his story made a great impression on all around. "And do you know where your brother is at the present time?" asked the magistrate.

"I do not. I have never seen him since I closed this door."

"I can testify to that, for we've been between ye ever since," said the constable.

"Where does he think to fly to?—what is his occupation?"

"He's a watch and clock maker, sir."

"'A said 'a was a wheelwright—a wicked rogue," said the constable.

"The wheels o' clocks and watches he meant, no doubt," said Shepherd Fennel. "I thought his hands were palish for 's trade."

"Well, it appears to me that nothing can be gained by retaining this poor man in custody," said the magistrate; "your business lies with the other, unquestionably."

And so the little man was released off-hand; but he looked nothing the less sad on that account, it being beyond the power of magistrate or constable to raze out the written troubles in his brain, for they concerned another, whom he regarded with more solicitude than himself. When this was done, and the man had gone his way, the night was found to be so far advanced that it was deemed useless to renew the search before the next morning.

Next day, accordingly, the quest for the clever sheep-stealer became general and keen, to all appearance at least. But the intended punishment was cruelly disproportioned to the transgression, and the sympathy of a great many country folk in that district was strongly on the side of the fugitive. Moreover, his marvellous coolness and daring under the unprecedented circumstances of the shepherd's party won their admiration. So that it may be questioned if all those who ostensibly made themselves so busy in exploring woods and fields and lanes were quite so thorough when it came to the private examination of their own lofts and out-houses. Stories were afloat of a mysterious figure being occasionally seen in some old overgrown trackway or other, remote from turnpike-roads; but when a search was instituted in any of these suspected quarters nobody was found. Thus the days and weeks passed without tidings.

In brief, the bass-voiced man of the chimney-corner was never recaptured. Some said that he went across the sea, others that he did not, but buried himself in the depths of a populous city. At any rate, the gentleman in cinder-gray never did his morning's work at Casterbridge, nor met anywhere at all for business purposes the comrade with whom he had passed an hour of relaxation in the lonely house on the coomb.

The grass has long been green on the graves of Shepherd Fennel and his frugal wife; the gu[illegible] who made up the [illegible] mainly followed their [illegible] the [illegible] night and [illegible]

OUR RIVER.

BY H. H.

Barely blue at noon, our childhood's river,
At eve all soft and silver white,
In June its runs with blossoms bright—
Our childish prizes and delight;
Our home, in shade of sycamores,
Looked up and down the emerald shores;
Our harvest meadows, broad and fair,
In autumn perfumed all the air:
The stream with endless joys seemed rife;
'Twas placid where all else was strife,
Our hopes, our wealth, lay in its life:
From boy to man we loved our river.

Sudden, a livid sea, our river
Came roaring past the sycamore wood;
Crushed like an egg-shell where it stood,
Our home swirled down the seething flood,
Its rafters spinning off like chips,
Its windows wide like parted lips;
Our harvest meadows torn and flung
Like navels in maelstrom eddies flung;
My brother's hands in terror neared,
In the same second swallowed, lost,
Where boiling torrents surged and crossed—
Good God! And we had loved that river!

APPROACHING THE TRUTH.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE RETURN TO THE FARM.

It was a weird scene, worthy of a painter's pencil in that hour; the ragged, uncouth man with the red light upon his face, stooping and examining the things he had unearthed, and holding them close to the old lantern for that purpose; the tall figure of the farmer keenly watching him; the gaunt ribs of the wreck rising above them like grim, unshapely witnesses; the dark night closing them in, and the bright stars, like eyes of fire, looking down upon them.

"Bury them again, Fladge," said John Woodhatch "they are better where they are."

Fladge looked up surprised and discomfited.

"Why, what can the use—"

Put them back," said Woodhatch, gruffly. "I [illegible] to know they were there, that was all."

"It's your spud," cried Fladge, "with the name burnt into the handle—I recollect—"

"Recollect nothing, and say nothing," interrupted Woodhatch, sternly.

"Where's Greg?" asked Fladge, as if even his slow comprehension had connected his task with the young man whom he had seen last with the master.

"Gone back."

"Oh!"

Fladge asked no more questions; he was content to do the farmer's bidding, to betray no further curiosity, to forget even the task which had been set him, if he could. John Woodhatch watched him as he shovelled back the sand into its place, and when the task was finished it was only Reuben Fladge's half whoop of exultation that aroused him from the train of thought into which he had fallen.

He had been wondering how it would end, and what would become of Greg Dorward—what he should do with him, and in what way he could be of service to him, had no Greg was, desperately as he had struggled to keep his secret from him, and proclaim himself above reproach. What was to be done with this new and awful failure—this young fellow with the hangman's rope about his neck and the sin of murder on his soul? He, John Woodhatch, could not betray him—could not betray him: he had shared his home with Greg, he had plotted and planned for his advancement, he had placed implicit trust in him, and it was not the hand of the master which should shut every ray of light away. He had had such thoughts as those when he had told Hester Brake he was not the avenger of her brother's death, when the thought had come awfully close to him that Greg had struck that brother down. Of late days he had loved this Greg Dorward like a son, there were traits of character in Greg which had won upon him strangely, and the youth's aptitude in learning, his energy for work, his respect for him, his love of a son for him almost, had all drawn a lonely man's heart-strings more closely round him than John Woodhatch had guessed until this terrible discovery.

He did not think of Morris Brake deeply, or of the justice which should stand first before all thought of others. It was himself in Greg's place which he sketched in lurid colors—and it was Greg's safety which, in his heart, he was considering. He could make allowance for the wild, desperate nature of the boy whom he had tried to save; he had brought him down to Lincolnshire marked "Dangerous"; he had received him from Prutwell's hands with many a warning of the risk he ran; and this was the awful yet natural outcome of it. This was the very end of it, he thought.

"Are you ready, Fladge?" he asked; "we will go home together, if you are."

"All right, master," answered Fladge; "and where did you say was Master Greg?"

"Gone back."

"Ah!—yes."

John Woodhatch and Fladge went their way over the sands, but at a slower pace than Greg and the master had adopted in coming to the village of Skegg Shore. There were leaden weights to the farmer's feet now, and he lingered by the way. He wanted time to think, and that great, dark space to think in: there was so much to prepare and be fore armed against, and his stout mind would not fall into marching order as they were wont to do. Yes, his chief thought was how to save Greg Dorward from the consequences of his dire crime; not how to bring a murderer to justice. Wrong in the sight of Heaven, very likely, he thought, with his hands clinched and his brow knit in his agony of meditation, but he must save the lad at any risk. Let him have one more chance, if possible, and away from Farm Forlorn. Greg had striven hard, and by much duplicity, to conceal his crime; but the stake he had played for was his life, and John Woodhatch would not condemn him without mercy. Let others do that, not he. He was neither judge nor executioner.

He passed into the farm-house with the same perplexed expression on his face, and those within it saw the death of Hester Brake which had cast so deep a shadow on him. They could not guess he had almost forgotten that night she was laid—that she had ever lived—in the trouble which her dying words had brought to him.

Lucy was sitting at the table listening to her father's reading from the Bible, and Parson Larcom was reading very intently and in a loud voice. In the background stood Mrs Chadderton, hardly an attentive listener, and fidgeting with the keys hanging at her waist. Mr Larcom had sent for her, as an especial mark of his favor on a solemn and memorable occasion, and also for Kitty, who, however, had not put in an appearance, but had sent down a hasty message that she was ill and could not come.

John Woodhatch entered brusquely, and with but scant measure of respect for Mr Larcom's Bible-reading, he said,

"Where's Greg?"

Mrs. Chadderton answered for the assembled company, and just as the preacher had begun another verse:

"He has not been seen since he left the house with you, sir. But he may have gone to his room."

"Very likely. Send some one to see."

"Yes, sir."

The housekeeper not unwillingly withdrew, and Mr Larcom closed his Bible with a bang.

"I'm thinking ye might have waited, John, till I had finished."

"There is no guessing when you are going to finish, Alec," said Woodhatch, "but go on."

"Not with people cramping to and out, and sending messages, and nobody paying the least attention to the blessed Gospel. Why should I waste my breath?" said Mr Larcom.

"Ah! yes—exactly," replied John Woodhatch, absently, then he crossed his arms and fell into a fresh train of thought until Mrs Chadderton returned.

"Mr Dorward has not come back, sir," she announced.

"He is busy, I know. He has much to do," said John Woodhatch. "What time is it?"

"Ten o'clock," was the reply.

"Ah! yes—quite early. Should he return before you lock up for the night, Mrs. Chadderton, tell him I am sitting in this room. Waiting for him," he added.

"Yes, sir."

Mrs. Chadderton withdrew once more, and Mr Larcom began quietly to fill his long clay pipe, and to stare meanwhile at his host.

"Are ye going to sit up, John?" he asked.

"A little later than usual, perhaps," was the reply.

"Ah! I'll keep ye company, then."

"I don't require any company. I fancy I am best alone to-night," he answered.

Alec Larcom did not take the hint, if it were a hint, that was conveyed in this absent fashion. He lighted his pipe carefully, puffed out the smoke, and reminded John Woodhatch with keen scrutiny. Lucy had already risen, seeing more clearly that the farmer wished to be alone.

"I am going up to Kitty. If I should not return again, good-night, John," she said.

"Good-night, Lucy."

"You must not grieve too much for your loss," she said, as she shook hands with him.

"I am not grieving," he replied. "I don't know, Lucy, if I am not envying her; she is past all care and disappointments."

"Yes," answered Lucy, "that is true."

She kissed her father and went away, and Parson Larcom drew a chair to the hearth-rug, sat down, and faced his friend.

"It's cold enough for a fire to-night," he said.

"I am warm. And it's late," was the reply.

"Oh, I don't want a fire, John. I was only thinking it was cold for the end of August," he remarked. "But then these are cold, cold times for all of us."

"Yes, that's true."

John Woodhatch did not speak further for a considerable period, would not have spoken again, perhaps, had not his friend once more attracted his attention.

"Ye take due to heart too much, John, as ye take everything, for that matter. That's your failing," said Mr Larcom; "and, after all, as ye imply, she's better off. It was a world of much pain and many tiresome fancies to her, poor soul."

"Yes."

"And I'm thinking, John, we should be a trifle warmer with a little whiskey."

"It shall be sent up to your room, Alec."

"Ay, when I go, then. It wouldn't be quite friendly leaving you here all alone," observed the parson.

"I shall be glad to be alone to-night," was the frank admission; "I am no fit company for any living soul."

"Is there not the will to read?" said Mr Larcom, after a preliminary cough.

"What will?"

"Miss Brake's, to be sure. Why, it's terribly dazed ye seem, John," replied the Methodist.

"Let the will rest. I am not curious about it."

"Ay, but I am," exclaimed Mr Larcom, "being related to her by marriage, as it were; and being doubtful if it's a seemmle or Christian-like document, John, knowing how eccentric a body she was."

"No matter what she was," muttered the farmer.

"Ye don't think of looking at the will to-night, then?"

"No."

"There may be motions in it as to her funeral," suggested Mr Larcom; "it's a foolish custom to defer opening people's wills, and so burying folk sometimes clean contrary to instructions. Haven't ye known that more than once, John, to occur?"

"Her instructions as to her funeral I took down this day in writing, and as her request," said Woodhatch. "They are very simple. And after the funeral her will is to be read, she adds."

"Gracious! and why couldn't ye say as much before, instead of keeping me out of my lawful rest?" exclaimed Mr Larcom. "I'll bid ye a good-night, John."

"Good-night," was the deep-voiced response.

"It's been an uncomfortable day for us all; but it's the common lot, ye know as well as most men."

"Yes."

"And why we should be as desperately upset about it I don't see, unless something else has happened," he said, shrewdly.

"Good night, old Alec," replied John Woodhatch; "don't trouble yourself about me in any way. Every man has his dark hour—the hour when he is better by himself."

"Ay—yes."

And then Mr Larcom departed, and was heard the instant afterward in the corridor giving elaborate instructions about his whiskey before he went up-stairs to his room.

John Woodhatch listened to Mr Larcom's distant voice and the receding footsteps on the old brass-bound stairs, as if to make sure the Methodist was departing for the night, and when all was still he took from his pockets the papers which he had been writing out that day, and looked them over carefully. Mrs. Chadderton came in, retired again after his steady stare to stand her, closed the door outside behind her, reopened it, and returned meekly to his side.

"Greg has not come back," she said.

"I know it. He would have been with me else. Where be—"

"He will never return, sir."

"Ha! Who says that? What makes you think that?"

"He has written a line to Kitty," she replied, "she will come to you presently, if you will wait for her—when the house is still. Console her, sir, if you can; pray do."

And then Mrs. Chadderton vanished away again.

CHAPTER XXIII.

WHEN THE HOUSE WAS STILL.

JOHN WOODHATCH waited very patiently for the arrival of Kitty Vanch. He sat almost like a statue in his chair, looking far ahead of him at the possibilities of life, tracing on the down-hill road the figure of the boy whom he had seen first at Prutwell's, coming from the darkness to the light. And now from light to darkness back again!

The master of Farm Forlorn did not adopt his old habit of pacing the full limits of the room, he had not the energy of thought that night to keep him moving; he was as one very weary, even utterly disheartened.

The house was still, but Kitty Vanch was long in coming to him. It was still as the grave within—as the dead woman above-stairs; only the far off moaning of the wind across the sea and fen-land was heard beyond the farm, like a sail over the lost sands, the last failure of the man who had tried to do too much.

He sat with some papers in his hands still, those existing strictly to the affairs of Hester Brake he had thrust into his pocket, those relating to Greg Dorward, to Hester Brake's written history of how she had tracked the crime out, were still within his hands, clutched tightly, as if in fear of losing them. He had read them over and over again, he had committed them to memory against his will; but the facts were corrosive, and burned themselves in; he should never forget them, and he did not care for any one else to hear of them, much less remember them.

Presently the door opened noiselessly, and Kitty Vanch crept in, looking more like a ghost than Kitty Vanch, as white and solemn a face was it in that hour of their meeting.

"Well, Kitty," he said, in almost his old tones, "what has kept you up so late to-night? And why are you anxious to see me?"

"Oh, you know, sir," answered Kitty at once—"you know too well."

"What do I know?"

He was on his guard to the last. It might be that Kitty knew not anything of what had actually happened, and Greg had told her nothing which could account truly for his departure. It would be like Greg—it would be wise.

"You know Greg has gone away," she exclaimed, dropping into the chair facing him, and looking as tired and weary as himself, "and that it is forever."

"He has not come back, but I have been expecting him."

"You have?" she asked, regarding him incredulously.

"Yes."

"Read that."

She opened her hand, in which had been crumpled a scrap of paper, and John Woodhatch took it from her, smoothed it out, and read those hastily scrawled pencil lines:

"SARAH SQUARE RAILWAY STATION, August 28, 18—.

"I am leaving for London at once. The master will tell you all. Good-by."

There was no signature, and it was not addressed to Kitty Vanch, but it was in Greg's handwriting unmistakably.

"How did you get this?"

"I found it on the dressing-table of my room," said Kitty; "Greg had climbed up from the outside, I think, and put it there."

"Very likely," answered John Woodhatch, returning it to her.

"You are not surprised," said Kitty.

"No, I am not surprised," was the reply. "I thought he would go away—if not to-night."

"And—why?" asked Kitty.

"It is important he should go to London. Business—"

Kitty leaned forward and laid her hand upon his arm.

"I will not deceive you, sir, and I don't want you to try and deceive me. I know everything."

"What do you know, my poor Kitty?" asked John Woodhatch. To the last he would not betray this poor shred of a secret which was left. He seemed to hold to it jealously, as though it was his own—as though his interest in screening a criminal from justice was far greater than his doctrine of atonement. He would acknowledge nothing, do nothing, for Greg Dorward's sake. He had been proud of Greg till this hour.

"I know Miss Brake charged him with the murder of her brother. And you wrote down all she said this afternoon," said Kitty.

"Do you think it is true?"

"Yes," answered Kitty; "Greg does not deny it."

"And I was to tell you all, he said?"

"Yes," repeated Kitty once more, "if you will. See, I am quite prepared. Very strong, sir, to hear any bad news, and to meet any bad news."

"It has been a terrible day, and it closes terribly," said John Woodhatch, "but to you, girl, it should be a bright beginning."

"Why?" cried Kitty, with her eyes ablaze now. "This is an escape for you," she the answer; "he might have been your husband, and the truth might have come years hence, when you could not get from it."

"Oh! if it had been," exclaimed Kitty, "then I should have been with him—shared his trials—fought his battles—kept him strong! If it had only happened later on even, at any cost to me!"

"You were fond of him, then?" inquired Woodhatch, "you did not leave him because you had forgotten how to love him?"

"He was everything to me then," said Kitty; "he is everything now."

"He is the murderer of Morris Brake," came the solemn answer back.

"God forgive him!—yes, that may be," cried Kitty, "but it must have been in self-defense, after some insult or blow. It was not murder, I am sure."

This was the echo of Greg's own horrid explanation of the crime, told on the dark sands, with the stars for witnesses, thought John Woodhatch. And it was so very near the truth.

"Still, he killed Morris," said the farmer, thoughtfully, "and the law will not forgive him."

"It was five years ago, when he was only a lad—a wild, desperate boy, who had seen you for a day or two, not longer, and was afraid of you," she cried. "He never had his chance, sir, the evil met him here at once, and mastered him—he was always passionate and violent and mad—he would only listen to me—he had never known what good was, what bad was, and at the Reformatory he had only met with hard masters and hard words. He had no chance—he never had a chance until it was too late. Don't think too cruelly of him, Mr Woodhatch—for God's sake don't turn against him now, and set them all in search of him. Think what you were yourself—what might have become of you! Don't hang the poor sinner, who has shared your home and life—don't think of the Law. Think how he loved you and looked up to you as his model always. And he did! he did! he did!"

She was kneeling at his feet now; it was with difficulty that he raised her from her suppliant posture.

"My poor Kitty, I do not need your intercession for him. I shall not stir one step in the," he said, "the Hands of Justice I taught try to drag him from—never to put him into."

"God bless you!" murmured Kitty.

"It is not justice," he added, "but then I am not a just man. She should have told Alec Larcom had she wanted justice."

"Did she wish him hanged, sir?" asked Kitty, in a terrified whisper.

"No. She left it to me to act. She had forgotten what I had been in my time, or what Greg Dorward had become to me. And I act thus, Kitty."

He walked to the lamp and held the papers over the flame, Kitty watching, with her hands pressed upon her heart.

"That is the story—of it all?" she gasped forth.

"Yes—and thus it ends," he said.

Together they watched the papers consume and shrivel away to scraps of tinder, which fell upon the table never, and the fire of which left in them here and there was extinguished by the hand, hard hand of the master. Kitty stole to the door and looked out, listened, and came back again.

"Thank God!" she exclaimed, when John Woodhatch had completed his task.

"And now," he said, "what next?"

"Ah! what next? We must wait till we hear from him again, as I am sure we shall," said Kitty.

"As I am sure we shall not," answered Woodhatch, "and as it is best we should not."

"I pray we may—and soon," cried Kitty.

"No, no. He must pass away now from your life as from mine," said John Woodhatch. "He has deceived us all—and there's an end of him."

"No, no."

"We have spared him, but he is unworthy of us. He belongs not to us ever again. Try and think that," said Mr Woodhatch.

"He belongs to me on the end, sir," murmured Kitty. She stooped and kissed his hand, as if in gratitude and reverence, and then went silently from the room.

John Woodhatch did not follow her. He sat down in his old place, and thought it all over once more.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"COMPEER."

No, this was not the end of it. Let him talk as he would, plan as he might, the end of all interest in Greg Derward, and of Greg Derward's life, had not come to pass simply because he had presumed it so. He would have deceived Kitty Vanch into this belief, he was trying hard, but vainly, to deceive himself with it, but the boy from Fruiwell's remained foremost in his thoughts. What had become of him? In the future what would become of him? Would the vain, persistent, calculating character of Greg stand him in good stead now, or apart from all his friends, and beginning life afresh without them all? Could he forget them easily and start again without much thought concerning them? Would he be callous or sorry? Was he devoid of feeling, or possessed of a deeper feeling than any one had guessed at? What was the natural character of such a man as he, who for five years had so completely baffled them, who, from his youth upward, had played as terrible a part, and with never worse the winer, save old Sphinx? Might there not be truth—had it not the clear ring of truth about it?—in the statement made upon the sands that it was the death of Morris Brake which had altered Greg's life for the better? A horrible moral, but surely a grim truth in it. John Woodhatch understood this, if no one else did. A better, stronger life had followed the murder at Skegs Shore—a something like repentance, perhaps, who could tell?

"I will atone for this till the end of my days!" That had been Greg Derward's motto—he had owned to it, and John Woodhatch, with a clearer light upon the case, could see in what way it had shaped Greg's career. It had not made Greg a sad or a religious man; it had not troubled him on very much, this crime. Years hence he would have learned almost to forget it, to set it so much apart from the current of his life as to regard it as a something appertaining to a past which was scarcely his own.

The days seemed to drag on painfully enough at Farm Forlorn, everybody appeared to have dropped into the old waiting, expectant attitude, and no one would have guessed the storm had already broken forth by the white, calm faces flitting through the house.

On the coming Wednesday Miss Brake would be buried in Skegs Shore church-yard with her brother, and till that day let the dead rest—the dead woman and her wishes, the dead hopes of more than hers, the dead, dry promises of many things which had had their birth under the old roof-tree.

John Woodhatch would not disturb at present the false peace of the farm; he would say nothing to Lucy about the discovery of her husband's murderer; after the funeral he would tell her the whole story, and beg her to forgive Greg, as Greg, truly penitent, craved to be forgiven by her whose life his mad ten had shadowed. And, reasoned John Woodhatch, supposing Lucy, this elaborate Lucy, and her father, looked very naturally at the facts on a different and sterner light, and craved for vengeance, as justice which might be akin to vengeance, why, Greg would have had time to get away.

Always that strange wish at the bottom of his heart to secure the safety of Greg Derward, the boy he had brought up, the man whose career he had shaped out, and who had shown such promise. God desert him be his hour of need of this young life should end at the gallows foot! thought Woodhatch. That should not be the end of it, after all his efforts. He swore then, with a heavy frown upon his face, and his big hands clenched together: "He was deserving of more reward than that," he exclaimed, defiantly, and even profanely; he was the competent of it all, and life was unprofitable to him now as was the moral wreckage which misfortune had cast at his feet.

If it were not for Kitty Vanch he should have all hope in human kind, he thought, at this disturbed epoch of his life, he should disbelieve in the possibility of doing good, of altering human character and nature, of sowing and tearing on the barren rock, and seeing the result in fair green blades of promise; he should believe only in grim Fate and hereditary instincts, of the power of darkness on being both darkness after as blind, but nothing brighter or better, or with a single gleam of God's sunshine on it ever.

No one appeared interested or surprised at Gregory Derward's sudden absence from the farm; the plea of business away had been accepted by Lucy and her father on a matter of course, and there were many matters occupying the minds of the minister and his daughter just then. It seemed that John Woodhatch and Kitty bore the brunt of it all, with the shadowy figure of Mrs. Chadderton watching them with keen interest from the background of her silent life, an important factor to be accounted for when least expected by these two.

John Woodhatch was a very early riser, we know; but on coming down on the Monday morning he was surprised to find Kitty dressed and waiting for him—dressed as if for a journey, and with a deep black veil thrown back from her sad young face.

"What is it now?" he asked, harshly, like a man irritated by surprises; "why are you masquerading about in this way, Kitty?"

"I am going away," she answered, very calmly.

"Going away!" he repeated, like a man in a dream; "and directly?"

"Yes."

"Where are you going?"

"To find Greg."

John Woodhatch's broad brow contracted at this answer; he had not bargained for Kitty's acting in any way contrary to the wishes he had already expressed. Greg had been screened, had been assisted to escape, but there was an end to him, for all that. He had said as; and now this slight, fragile woman faced him with a determination contrary to his, and opposed to him in every particular.

"You can not find him," he muttered, "and it would be madness if you could."

"I will make the trial. I am quite resolved, sir," she said, firmly; "and I am very, very sorry if you wish me to remain. But go I must."

"There is no reason for haste, or foolish mystery," exclaimed Woodhatch, "you only attract suspicion by acting in this way. You know that."

"Ay, but how it is to be helped"

"By appearing for a time more like yourself," he replied; "by waiting patiently, by— Kitty," he cried, in a sharper tone, "you have heard from Greg again. I am sure of it."

Kitty had turned paler, but she did not flinch from the gaze of the master. She only drew her dark mantle closer round her shoulders, as though the early morning air felt bleak and raw, and said, in a low voice,

"Yes, I have heard."

"When?"

"Late last night."

"Where is the message? Where is he? What does he want? Why does he write to you, and take no heed of me?" he asked, hurriedly.

Kitty clasped her hands together and looked away from him at last.

"I can not answer your questions," she replied. "In mercy's name, sir, let me keep faith with him."

"And break it with me?"

"God forbid that—always," answered Kitty.

"But you do that now, you are sure of it yourself," said Mr Woodhatch, "when you side with him against me. You turn like all the rest of them. I am not deserving man's or woman's confidence."

"Oh, dear master," urged Kitty, "do not look upon it in this awful light. But let me go, and say good-speed to me."

"You are going to your doom, child, when you go to such as he is," he answered.

"I do not mind that. And if it is to be so, why, for his sake," said Kitty, "I will go willingly enough."

"For his sake?"

"Yes."

"And after all—in his selfishness and trouble—he asks you to come to him, and leave me here?" said Woodhatch.

"No, no, he does not ask me to come," answered Kitty; "I am going against his wish as well as yours."

"Why, then—"

"And I am going to save him, if I can. I was always his friend, you know," she added, with a new excitement suddenly exerting itself; "and I am going to stand his friend again, if he will have me, as I think he will."

"Where is he?"

Kitty hesitated for a moment again, and then replied to him:

"At Bolter's Rents, where he has been tempted to return on many times by the impulse of the evil that was in him. He is with them all, he is back again in their midst, he who fought his way so well from them, and now to come to this at last. Ah, sir," she cried, "you will not stop me now, I am sure!"

"Yes, I would."

"I am sorry," was the answer, "but—I must go."

"To Bolter's Rents—where the bad life would begin again, whence no good can ever spring—where Greg will stay"

"Trust me," was all that Kitty could respond.

"I have lost trust in every living thing," replied John Woodhatch, "so completely on every human soul has lost all trust in me. So it must be now on the end."

"You do not know everything, sir—you—"

"Show me the letter you have received?" he demanded, suddenly.

"I can not," she murmured; "I have destroyed it."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Very well," he said, and turned as if to leave her. She stopped him progress.

"I am going away, sir. Is there any message for Greg?"

"There is money waiting for his passage abroad—when he writes to me for it. Tell him that if you will"

"Nothing else?"

"Nothing else."

"Good-by, sir. If you would only say good-speed to me before I go away, I should feel the stronger woman," said Kitty, "for I am not ungrateful—not unmindful of all the good you have tried to do—but, not wholly understanding, pray believe me."

He stood regarding her very sternly still, her appeal was lost on him, her wish to get away from him, to go back to Greg and Greg's life, was only too apparent. Before he could reply—if he had even intended a reply to this strange, impulsive girl—there came between them, dressed also as for a journey, the grave figure of the housekeeper.

John Woodhatch broke into a rough unseemly laugh at this.

"What! another departure from the plague-stricken house!" he exclaimed—"only one more!"

"Yes, Mr. Woodhatch. Has she not told you?"

"No."

"I am going away with her," said Mrs. Chadderton; "it is my duty, you will see. sir. It is the duty which you will not try to check me in, knowing what she is, and what I am."

"Have you told her—"

"That I am her mother?—yes," was the reply, as she drew Kitty's hand within her arm, "and she does not shrink from me. She will trust me very soon."

"Ah! well," said John Woodhatch, very bitterly, "it is right mother and daughter should go together in life—it is more than right in this case, I suppose. I don't know. I don't understand, and I have given up all guessing."

"But—"

"What did you ask me to my just now, Kitty?" he inquired.

"To say godspeed," she said, very earnestly and solicitously

"Yes, yes, so it was. Well—God speed you two women on your way from Farm Forlorn, and God help you both at Bolter's Rents!"

MARCH.

Oh, what a petulant child is the season,
Beaming one moment and laughing the next,
Pleased without rhyme and enraged without reason,
Mollified instantly, again he is vexed!

Who ever heard such a shrieking and blowing?
Yet there's the sun in a positive glare;
Just as the world in its gold light is glowing,
Down comes a great dash of snow through the air.

Spite of his sunshine, we're ready to flout him,
Pleet this monstrously month and his moods;
Spite of his temper, we won't do without him;
Deep in its stormy breast coming peace broods.

So, when our ten-year-old Tom is surely,
Trying our patience from morning till night,
We can believe—and I hope not unduly—
Promise of better things, days out of sight.

KATE GOODWIN.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE effectiveness of the razor as a weapon is believed to have been discovered by the negroes of this country. In late years it has been adopted by many of the Italians in New York who had previously cherished a preference for the stiletto. The impression has prevailed that the razors employed as weapons were old ones which had come to that base use through successive steps of degradation, being used surreptitiously to small boys for sharpening slate-pencils, and afterward by heads of families for removing the superfluous cuticle from pedal excrescences. But it appears that in Sheffield, England, where the monopoly of razor-making is held, a kind of razor especially designed for belligerents is manufactured. The London Times says that this razor is sent to the United States in large numbers, and describes it as being "very keen in the blade, which can be suddenly thrown back and held between the fingers for a dash at the face."

Within the past ten months the value of Manila pearl shells, used in hafting cutlery and other goods, has increased from about $300 a ton in the London market to $1200 a ton. In three years the price of ivory has risen at least one hundred per cent.

The Panama Star and Herald suggests that perhaps some of the vessels which have sailed away never to return to land were sunk by meteors, and mentions a recent curious escape of the United States war vessel Alaska. One day while at sea, a few minutes after sunset, those on board heard a loud rushing noise, and saw a meteor of great brilliancy descend and burst when within some ten degrees of the horizon. It left a figure like an immense dirigible, all aglow with a bluish white light, which took the form of a spiral line, and then gradually disappeared.

The scheme for establishing an "express line" of fast steel steam-ships between this country and England, to carry passengers only, and to make the voyage in five or six days, has been abandoned. It is noteworthy that the demands of freight traffic have thus far been the incentive which has produced the swiftest steam-ships. The most notable achievement in this line have resulted from the rivalry in bringing the new tea crops from China to England. The rivalry has extended, in a considerable degree, to this port, some of the closest steam-ship races having been kept up from the other side of the globe, around through the Suez Canal, and to New York.

The manager of a Western railway with Florida connections estimates that there are there thousand Northern people now in that State. A correspondent of the Hartford Times writes that there are three seasons in Florida—the orange, vegetable, and invalid season—and that the last named is the most profitable to the Floridians.

After about a year of interchange of communications the diplomates of Yale and Harvard colleges have come to terms with respect to their annual boat-race. Last year the Yale boat was the longer, and the question was whether, in the coming race, the boats should start with stems even or bows even, and whether the finish should be made by bows or stems. The result of the correspondence and conferences is an agreement that the sheils shall be started with even wains, and that the boat which carries its middle across the line first shall be declared the winner. In horse-racing it is the rule to start and finish by noses, but on view of the Yale-Harvard agreement perhaps the esinteered authorities of the turf will take into consideration the different lengths of horses, and decide that hereafter they must start and finish by middles.

An enthusiastic newspaper worker was Samuel Medill, the managing editor of the Chicago Tribune, who died recently of consumption at Quincy. After eagerly looking over the Chicago morning papers that were brought to his bed on the last day of his life, he smiled and said, "Our boys have beat them on the Brantwood business." Those were almost his last words.

Suggestion for Cincinnati and Louisville. The great flood at Bristol, England, last fall, is to be commemorated by forty ornamental lamp-posts, the heights of the lamps varying to correspond to the level reached by the water at various points.

Even millionaires are not always self possessed in the midst of new surroundings. The maiden speech in the Senate-chamber of Mr Tabor, of Colorado, is reported as follows: "Mr President, I am pained with the gentleman from Hampton, Mr South Carolina."

The Irish question seems to be, Who is No. 1? Perhaps the answer is Sw one.

By the death of his father, the late Prince Charles of Prussia, Prince Frederick Charles comes into possession of an income which will be an acceptable addition on the rather limited means which he has had at his command. He receives about $1,000,000 in cash, and the contract of several estates, besides most of the art collections of his father, a magnificent armory, a stud of eighty horses, and a famous pack of bloodhounds. The palace on which his father resided on the Wilhelmsplatz in Berlin belongs to the Crown Prince, but has been granted to Prince Frederick Charles. He is to engage the court and household of his father. The late Prince Charles left a fortune of some $6,750,000 in money, $750,000 of which is to be devoted to charitable purposes. Prince Frederick Charles is the father of the Duchess of Connaught.

It is told of Doré the artist that one day of lachi he made an exquisitely pretty sketch of a scene at a peasant's wedding, and left his album in the pocket of his paletot when he went to dinner on returning to his hotel. After dinner the album was not to be found, and Doré retired furious. On the next day he received a parcel, and a letter in which the anonymous author wrote: "Sir,—Knowing you would see well your album, I robbed you of it (the last sketch of yours being quite irresistible); but in order that you should not take me for a common thief, I beg your acceptance of the accompanying traveler's staff." The parcel contained a gold-headed cane, ornamented with precious stones. Doré never learned the name of the giver.

An interesting part of the story of the second and last arctic voyage of Mr Leigh Smith's yacht Eira was told recently at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society in a paper written by Mr Smith and read by Dr Neale, who was the physician with the expedition. There were twenty-five men on board the Eira. The object of the expedition was to extend the knowledge as to the coasts of Franz-Josef Land acquired in the course of a voyage made in the previous year. Franz-Josef Land was sighted on July 23, 1881. In August the hope of being able to proceed in search of the Jeannette was cut off by the ice. On the 21st of that month, while the Eira was lying near Bell Island, protected by a grounded iceberg from the pack ice which was drifting into the bay, the berg gave way, and the yacht was crushed by the ice, and sank in sixty-six feet of water. Before the sank a quantity of provisions was rescued from the vessel. The men set about building a hut of turf and stone. They suffered greatly from the cold, even at that season of the year. In the course of the fall twenty-one bears, thirteen walrus, and about twelve hundred loons were shot, the men being aided in the hunt by a black retriever, Bob, which had been taken from England by the explorers. A canary bird found the weather too severe, and died on New-Year's Eve. All the coal was used by January 8, and from that time the only fuel was blubber. The breakfast of the men while in the camp consisted of ten pounds of bear and walrus meat cut up and made into soup with vegetables, with a pint of tea for each man. For dinner they had bear and walrus stew with dumplings, and for supper meat-and vegetable soup and tea. A glass of rum was served to each man an hour after tea, and on Saturdays there was an extra allowance of grog. The men did not succeed in saving any lime juice when the vessel went down. Several musical instruments were saved, and on Christmas Eve and New-Year's Eve there were grand dinners, followed by concerts. There was not much total darkness. Even on the shortest day of the year there was about four hours' twilight. The aurorae resembled thin clouds lighted up by the moon, which was not of sight only ten days in each month. In May the work of making sails for the boats and preparing for the attempts to escape southward was begun, and on June 21 the party took their last meal in the hut in which they had spent nearly ten months. They left half a dozen bottles of champagne "for any one who might call." Then they launched their boats and made sail for the south, to be picked up eighty-six short days by the expedition which had gone in search of them.

HON. R. M. SAMS, SENATOR-ELECT FROM MINNESOTA. Photographed by Zimmerman.

THREE UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Of the three United States Senators whose portraits are given on this page, Mr. Beck, of Kentucky, is the oldest, having passed threescore years. He now enters upon the fifteenth year of his service in Congress, having been eight in the House and six in the Senate. He was born in Scotland, where he received an academic education. In 1846 he was graduated as a lawyer at Transylvania University, Lexington, Kentucky. He practiced his profession until elected to Congress.

General Manderson, the Senator from Nebraska, is a Philadelphian by birth, and near in age to Mr. Beck. He was born in 1837, and is a lawyer by profession. He served his country during the civil war, and earned the name of being a gallant fighter. He is evidently in favor of civil service reform, judging by a speech made before the Legislature after his election. He said: "I believe there is something higher and nobler in the position of a Senator of the United States than that of being the simple medium through which the patronage of this government shall be dispensed. That is a part of the duty, perhaps, but I look upon it as the meanest part. I certainly do not desire that this high office should be one a more broker shop for the distribution of offices. I see something higher than that, and I will not be an huckster."

Mr. Sams, who succeeds Mr. Windom as Senator from Minnesota, is less than forty years old, and is a native of Connecticut. At an early age he went to Illinois, where his father engaged in farming on an extensive scale, but his health failing, he returned to Connecticut, where most of his youth was passed, and where his father died. A few years later Mr. Sams, having been obliged by ill health to abandon his expectations for the legal profession, went to Minnesota, and by business shrewdness as a contractor soon acquired a large fortune. He has at present large State-prison contracts, and is said to be worth several millions. About a year ago a Northwestern car-manufacturing company, the most important corporation in the State, was organized, Mr. Sams being the principal (its builder, president, and manager. He has served several terms in the Legislature. Though not noted as a statesman or an orator, he is one of the shrewdest and most successful political managers in the Northwest. He is a very genial, prepossessing man, and stands to pay dear with all classes.

STREET BOYS IN NAPLES.

The Neapolitan street urchin is the most gay and all-pervading specimen of his Parisian prototype in his own way. As a pickpocket he may fairly claim the championship of the world, and the keeper of the Bristol patrol in one of its busiest days of excitement during the [illegible] coming [illegible] would be [illegible] bewildered, [illegible] and other small gear from [illegible] pockets, to which they were [illegible] Bedouin [illegible] of Arabs hunt [illegible] pockets of strangers, forbearing [illegible] offering [illegible] camels [illegible] into the sea. An English lady, asking one of these juvenile vagrants why he did not go to school and learn to read and write, received a confidential though silent answer when he stooped and wrote his name on the ground in the contemptuous characters. He then explained that he attended a night school, and thus combined a polite education with the prosecution of other pursuits by day. The exceptional sketch for learning of the Neapolitans received a striking proof under the reign of Napoleon, when a new system of post-office management, which took the German officials six weeks to acquire, was mastered in three days by those of Naples.

The other avocations of running errands, picking up cigar stumps [illegible] performing antics for the entertainment of foreigners are varied by the Neapolitan genius with others of a more equivocal character, and his career may be described as one of industry tempered by petit larceny. The [illegible] the penalty upon gaming, which is [illegible] a person will there [illegible] as with their elders, one of the [illegible] frequently witnessed in the streets consists in [illegible] a cigar at a small pile of nuts or other comestibles—the [illegible] successful throw.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

BY PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

III.

THAT IT IS NOT WICKED TO BE RICH, NAY EVEN, THAT IT IS NOT WICKED TO BE RICHER THAN ONE'S NEIGHBOR.

I have before me a newspaper slip on which a writer expresses the opinion that no one should be allowed to possess more than one million dollars' worth of property. Alongside of it is another slip on which another writer expresses the opinion that the limit should be five millions. I do not know what the comparative wealth of the two writers is, but it is interesting to notice that there is a wide margin between their ideas of how rich they would allow them fellow-citizens to become, and of the point at which they ("the state," of course) could step in to rob a man of his earnings. These two writers only represent a great deal of crude thinking and declaiming which is in fashion. I never have known a man of ordinary common sense who did not urge upon his sons, from earliest childhood, doctrines of economy, and the practice of accumulation. A good father believes that he does a service to courage enterprise, productive skill, prudent self-denial, and judicious expenditure on the part of his son. The object is to teach the boy to accumulate capital. If, however, the boy should read many of the diatribes against "the rich" which are afloat in our literature, if he should read or hear some of the current discussion about "capital," and if, with the ingenuousness of youth, he should take these productions at their literal sense, instead of discounting them as his father does, he would be forced to believe that he was on the path of infamy when he was earning and saving capital. It is worth while to consider what we mean or what we can mean by the rich? Is it mean to be a capitalist? If the question is one of degree only, and it is right to be rich up to a certain point and wrong to be richer, how shall we find the point? Certainly, for practical purposes, we ought to define the point nearer than between one and five millions of dollars.

There is an old ecclesiastical prejudice in favor of the poor and against the rich. In days when men acted by ecclesiastical rules these prejudices produced waste of capital, and helped mightily to explunge Europe into barbarism. The prejudices are not yet dead, but they survive in our society as hideous contradictions and inconsistencies. One thing must be granted to the rich: they are good-natured. Perhaps they do not recognize themselves, for a rich man is often harder to define than a poor one. It is not uncommon to hear a clergyman utter from the pulpit all the old prejudices produced waste of capital, and helped mightily to explunge Europe into barbarism. The prejudices are not yet dead, but they survive in our society as hideous contradictions and inconsistencies. One thing must be granted to the rich: they are good-natured. Perhaps they do not recognize themselves, for a rich man is often harder to define than a poor one. It is not uncommon to hear a clergyman utter from the pulpit all the old prejudices in favor of the poor and against the rich, while asking the rich to do something for the poor, and the rich comply without apparently losing their feelings hurt at all by the invidious comparison. We all agree that he is a good member of society who works his way up from poverty to wealth, but no sooner has he worked his way up we begin to regard him with suspicion as a dangerous member of society. A newspaper starts the silly fallacy that "the rich are rich because the poor are industrious," and it is copied from one end of the country to the other as if it were a brilliant apothegm. "Capital" is denounced by a dozen and speakers who have never taken the trouble to find out what capital is, and who (on the word in ten or three different senses in so many pages. Labor organizations are formed, not to employ combined effort for a common object, but to indulge in declamation and denunciation, and especially to furnish an easy living to some officers who do not want to work. People who have rejected dogmatic religion, and retained only a residuum of religious sentimentalism, find a special field in the discussion of the rights of the poor and the duties of the rich. We have denunciations of banks, corporations, and monopolies, also denunciations encouraging only helpless rage and animosity, because they are not controlled by any definitions or limitations, or by any distinctions between what is indispensably necessary and what is untrue, between what is established in the order of nature and what is legislative error. Think, for instance, of a journal which makes it its special business to denounce monopolies, yet favors a protective tariff, and has not a word to say against trades-unions or patents! Think of public teachers who say that the farmer is ruined by the cost of transportation, when they mean that he can not make any profits because his farm is too far from the market, and who denounce the railroad because it does not correct for the farmer at the expense of an unwholesome, the disadvantage which lies in the physical situation of the farm. Think of that construction of the situation which attributes all the trouble in the greed of "monopoly corporations." Think of the jokes at railroads that one has read about canvas, and watering stocks, and selling futures.

I undoubtedly rise me, in connection with each of these things, cases of fraud, swindling, and other immoral crimes, that is to say, the greed and weakness of men are perpetual. They get in new places, they adjust themselves to new forms of business, and constantly devise new methods of fraud and robbery, just as long laws devise new artifices to circumvent every new precaution of the lawmakers. The criminal law needs to be improved to meet new forms of crime, but to denounce financial devices which are useful and legitimate, because one is made of them for fraud, is ridiculous and unworthy of the age in which we live. Fifty years ago good old English Tories used to denounce all joint-stock companies in the same way, and for similar reasons.

All the denunciations and declamations which have been referred to are made in the interest of "the poor man." He agrees to our canons in echo in the halls of legislation, and he is the excuse and reason for all the acts which are passed. He is never forgotten in poetry, sermon, or essay. His interest is invoked to defend every doubtful procedure and every questionable innovation. Yet where is he? Who is he? Who ever saw him? When did he ever get the benefit of any of the numberless efforts in his behalf? When, rather, was his name and interest ever invoked, when, upon examination, it did not plainly appear that somebody else was to win—somebody who was far too smart ever to be poor, far too lazy ever to be rich to industry and economy?

A great deal is said about the unearned increment from land, especially with a view to the large gains of landlords in old countries. The unearned increment from land has indeed made the position of an English land owner, for the last two hundred years, the most fortunate that any class of aristocrats ever has enjoyed, but the present moment, when the rent of agricultural land in England is declining under the competition of American land, is not well chosen for attacking the old advantage. Furthermore, the unearned increment from land appears in the United States as a gain to the first comers, who have here had the foundations of a new State. Since the land is a monopoly, the unearned increment lies in the laws of nature. Then the only question is, Who shall have it?—the man who has the ownership by prescription or some or all others? Moreover, there is an unearned increment on capital and on labor, due to the pressure around the capitalist and the laborer of a great, industrious, and prosperous society. A tax on land and a succession or probate duty on capital might be perfectly justified by these facts. I quite consider capital accumulated with a rapidity which follows in some high series the accurate, good government peaceful order of the state in which it is employed, and if the state steps in, on the death of the holder, to claim a share of the inheritance, such a claim may be fully justified. The laborer inherits no gains in carrying on his labor in a strong, highly civilized, and well-governed state far more than he could gain with equal industry on the frontier or in the midst of anarchy. He gains greater remuneration for his services, and he also shares in the enjoyment of all that accumulated capital of a wealthy community which is public in semi-public in its nature.

The great gains of a great capitalist in a modern state must be put under the head of wages of superintendence. Any one who believes that any great enterprise of an industrial character can be started without taking most brave experience of life. Let any one try to get a railroad built, or to start a factory and win reputation for its products, or to start a school and win a reputation for it, or to found a new paper and make it a success, or to start any other enterprise, and he will find what obstacles must be overcome, what risks must be taken, what perseverance and courage are required what foresight and sagacity are necessary. Especially in a new country, where many tasks are waiting, where resources are undried to the utmost all the time the judgment courage, and perseverance required to organize an enterprise and carry them to success are sometimes heroic. Persons who possess the necessary qualifications obtain great rewards, they ought to do so. It is foolish to rail at them. Then, again, the ability to organize and conduct industrial, commercial, or financial enterprises is rare, the great expansion of industry are as sure to great generals. The great greatness of all co-operative enterprises is in the matter of supervision. We need routine men who can do a list there are told are too hard to find, but men who can think and plan and tell the routine men what to do are very rare. They are paid in proportion to the supply and demand of them.

If Mr. A. T. Stewart made a great fortune by collecting and bringing dry-goods to the people of the United States, he did so because he understood how to do that thing better than any other man of his generation. He proved it, because he earned the business through commercial crises and wars, and kept increasing its dimensions. If, when he died, he left no conquered sovereign, the business must break up, and pass into new organization in the hands of other men. Some have said that Mr. Stewart made his fortune out of those who worked for him or with him. But could those persons have been able to come together, organize themselves, and earn what they did earn without him? Not at all. They would have been comparatively helpless. He and they neglect formed a great system of factories stores, transportation, under his guidance and judgment. It was for the benefit of all; but he contributed to it what no one else was able to contribute—the one guiding mind which made the whole thing possible. In no sense whatever does a man who accumulates a fortune by legitimate industry exploit his employees, or make his capital "out of" anybody else. The wealth which he has earned would not be lost for him.

The aggregation of large fortunes is not at all a thing to be regretted. On the contrary, it is a necessary condition of many forms of social advance. If we should set a limit to the accumulation of wealth, we should say to our most valuable producers, "We do not want you to do us the services which you understand how to perform, beyond a certain point." It would be like killing off our generals in war. A great deal is said, in the case of a certain school, about "ethical views of wealth," and we are told that some day men will be found of such public spirit that, after they have accumulated a few millions, they will be willing to go on and labor simply for the pleasure of paying the taxes of their fellow-citizens. Possibly this is true. It is a prophecy. It is as impossible to deny it as it is folly to affirm it. For if a time ever comes when there are men of the kind, the men of that age will arrange their affairs accordingly. There are no such men now, and those of us who live and can not arrange our affairs by what men will be a hundred generations hence.

There is every indication that men are to see new developments of the power of aggregated capital to serve civilization, and that the new developments will be made right here in America. Joint-stock companies are yet in their infancy, and incorporated capital, instead of being a thing which can be overturned, is a thing which is becoming more and more indispensable. I shall have something to say in another paper about the necessary checks and guarantees, in a political point of view, which must be established. Economically speaking, aggregated capital will be more and more essential to the performance of our social tasks. Furthermore, it seems to me certain that all aggregated capital will fall more and more under personal control. Each great company will be known as controlled by one master mind. The reason for this lies in the great superiority of personal management over management by boards and committees. This tendency is to the public interest, for it is in the direction of more satisfactory responsibility. The great hinderance to the development of this continent has lain in the lack of capital. The capital which we have had has been wasted by division and dissipation, and by injudicious applications. We are to see the development pushed forward at an unprecedented rate by an aggregation of capital, and a systematic application of it under the direction of competent men. This development will be for the benefit of all, and it will enable each one of us, in his measure and way, to increase his wealth. We may each of us go ahead to do so, and we have every reason to rejoice in each other's prosperity. There ought to be no laws to guarantee property against the folly of its possessors. In the absence of such laws, capital inherited by a spendthrift will be squandered and re-accumulated in the hands of men who are fit and competent to hold it. So it should be, and undo such a state of things there is no reason to desire to limit the property which any man may acquire.

THE MOTTO IN A WEDDING RING.

A LOVER gave the wedding ring
Into the goldsmith's hand.
"Grave me," he said, "a tender thought Within this golden band."
The goldsmith graved,
With careful art,
"Till Death us part"

The wedding bells rang gladly out,
The husband said, "O wife,
Together we will share the grief,
The happiness of life.
I give to thee
My heart, my heart,
Till Death us part."

'Twas she that lifted now his hand
(O love, that thus should be!),
Then on it placed the golden band,
And whispered, tenderly,
"Till Death us join,
Lo, thou art mine
And I am thine!"

"And when Death joins we never more
Shall know an aching heart;
The bridal of that better love
Death has no power to part.
That teeth will be
For thee and me
Eternity."

So up the hill and down the hill
Through fifty changing years
They shared each other's happiness,
They dried each other's tears.
Alas! alas!
That Death's cold dart
Such love can part!

But one and day she stood alone
Beside his narrow bed;
She drew the ring from off her hand,
And to the goldsmith said:
"Oh, man, who graved
With careful art,
'Till Death us part,'

"Now grave here other words for me!
'Till Death us join.'" He took
The precious golden band once more,
With solemn, wistful look,
And wrought with care,
For love, not coin,
"Till Death us join."

THE NEW GERMAN MINISTER.

BARON VON EISENDECHER, the newly appointed German Minister to the United States, comes of a family of diplomatists. He was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main in June, 1841. His father was the Minister Plenipotentiary of the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg to the Federal Diet. Young VON EISENDECHER was sent at an early age to the Berlin Naval school, and when sixteen years of age he entered the Prussian navy. He took part in the first Prussian expedition to Japan. During the war between France and Germany he was the executive officer of the frigate Amazone, which was stationed at this port for several months. In 1872 he was placed on the retired list of naval officers, with the rank of Captain. He was appointed Resident Minister to Japan several years ago, and after serving in that capacity for about a year, he was raised to the rank of Plenipotentiary. While in Japan he was decorated with the order of the Rising Sun, an honor which is rarely conferred upon foreigners. The Baron was married only a short time before he left Germany. The Baroness is some years the junior of the Baron, and comes of one of the oldest families of Pomerania. A portrait of the Minister is given on page 148.

PREDICTING RAIN.

Parsons skilled in the use of the spectroscope are making experiments to determine how closely the approach of rain can be predicted through spectroscopic examination of the atmosphere. A foreign observer has published the results of experiments which he made in January. It has been found that rain is preceded by the appearance in the spectrum of a "rain-band." This experimenter made an observation each morning at nine o'clock in the direction from which the wind was blowing. For the purpose of comparison the boldness of the rain-bands on the different occasions is expressed in percentages. The rain-fall was measured twenty-four hours after each observation. He reports that the largest percentage of rain-band (70) was followed by a heavy rain. The percentage was 60 twice and 50 eight times, and in each instance there was rain. There was rain five times, and cloudy weather twice, following the seven observations, which showed forty per cent. of rain-band.

JEWELRY reflects more than anything else the art influences which surround it. Having a certain amount of durability, the worker in the precious metals perpetuates the epoch in which he lives. Recognized as that art which must be in a certain measure indifferent to the costly materials which enter into its composition, it seeks to enhance the beauty of the gems and the gold by making them subservient to human skill. Barbaric and uncultivated tendencies care for huge surfaces covered with stones, where crude masses of gold are displayed. It is that much more refined taste, as displayed by Etruscans and Greeks, that cares more for the delicacy of the work than the solid weight of the metal. Such passing attention as is generally paid to jewelry in somewhat prone to incline rather toward the material appreciation of these things. The intrinsic value of a well-painted picture has nothing to do with either cost of canvas or paint. It is that genius which masses the richest of colors, which makes the most delicate of tints, which alone delights the eye and is paid for. A well-composed jewel, a superbly conceived brooch, a graceful bracelet, a modest pendant are, then, something much more than diamonds, emeralds, pearls, or gold It must, to please, show a thorough acquaintance on the part of the maker with the most subtle canons of art. A metal has been taken and formed into the most perfect of shapes. It may be costly, because it is only of gold, and owes its excellence to itself, irrespective of rubies or sapphires—or then again on one whole max, to the extreme act of the gold worker, be lavished precious stones worth a prince's ransom.

It is well known that the growing demand in this country by the most intelligently discriminating buyers is for the finest diamonds only, and that the like careful choice extends to all other precious stones. Excellence in the selection of pearls has carried with it perfection in the mounting of them. Leading jewelers, in fact, have to be inventive, for the tastes of a well-informed public demand work which must be of marvellous excellence. Mr. Tiffany, Mr. STRAN, on Fifth Avenue, exhibits exquisite jewels, with the mountings as plain as possible, the stones, with their brilliant flash, wanting no metallic enhancements. It is with pearls of various hues that the real magic of the jeweler's art is brought most in prominence. Here were pearls of all shades, from black to rose, from the most creamy white-ness to those with opalescent reflections. One single brooch of dia monds was of amazing beauty. As if to contrast with sun on two stones of parrot color, there were blue diamonds, with that calm, quiet color of an early morning sky. Such diamonds may not be had even by the jeweler for the asking. Mr STRAN waits until he finds them. Then, having made his collection, they are brought together and then mounted

To a superb show of the choicest stones in rings and ear-rings are added other attractions, all adapted to people of studied tastes. The silver was superb. Those models of peculiar form which we in America have taken from the artistic Japanese are found here—pieces of silver where the individual skill of the silversmith is called into play. Such objects are not run through rolls or struck up by dies, but represent each the skill of a metallurgist in perfecting his alloys, and the perfection of the artist's own hand, either incensed with the hammer or with the graver. Of bronzes, Mr STRAN exhibited fine pieces from Barbedienne, Carpaux, Mercier, Picolo, and others. Chloa of the finest pâte, of the most graceful form, most choicely decorated, is called for now by those who purchase both diamonds and silverware. The cleverest work of English makers, the best Worcester, Copeland, and Staffordshire fictile wares, were here. The exhibition of a great house, which caters to those who are the most appreciative, presents a class of artistic objects not second to those hung on the walls of a picture-gallery.—[Adv.]

of which the proportion contributed (as computed) by Policies in Tontine class, is $4,915,252 00.

NEW ASSURANCE WRITTEN IN 1882, $62,262,270.

TOTAL OUTSTANDING ASSURANCE, $232,820,620.

The amount of new assurance written during 1882 exceeds the largest business ever done by any other company in one year.

For sixteen years—from 1867 to 1882, both inclusive—the Society has written a larger aggregate amount of new assurance than any other company.

Total amount paid policy-holders since the organization of the Society, $67,409,573 86.

The amount of Surplus, $7,409,190 95, over liabilities (four-per-cent. valuation) is larger, and the percentage of death claims to the amount at risk is smaller, than in any other of the five largest life assurance companies.

The Society issues a plain and simple contract of assurance, free from burdensome and technical conditions, as: INCONTESTABLE after three years. Such policies are payable IMMEDIATELY upon the receipt of satisfactory proofs of death, and without the delay of sixty or ninety days usual with other companies.

The Society has no contested claims on its books.

From the undivided surplus, contributed by policies in the General class, extraordinary dividends will be declared available on settlement of next annual premium, to ordinary participating policies. From the undivided surplus contributed by policies in the Tontine class, the amounts applicable to policies maturing within the current year will be duly declared, on their respective annual premium harvest days. The valuation of the policies outstanding has been made on the American Experience Table of Mortality with 4½ per cent. interest, the legal standard of the State of New York.

FARMER STEBBINS ON THE BOWERY

BY WILL CARLETON

DEAR BROTHER JOHN:

We [illegible] with [illegible]

An' then I hooked the village [illegible] I could
I rode upon the cars a block [illegible]
I walked through Wall [illegible] or hours,
I patronized a [illegible]
Who hadn't had [illegible]

I saw the road [illegible]
A million times as big as [illegible]
(I'm told that [illegible]
To me the country [illegible]
When who should I [illegible]
But Cousin Jeroboam John [illegible]

I had not seen him [illegible]
His face an' form [illegible]
But there there wasn't a chance of [illegible]
because,
If not, how should he ever know that I was who I was?
We brushed our old acquaintance up, an' soon was at our ease,
A-wanderin' all about the place, as easy as you please.

It's nicer far, in foreign towns, than 'tis to be alone,
To walk with one whose blood proceeds from sources near your own,
A similar temp'rature of heart, a sort of family ease,
Enables you to work your tongue as Eb'ral as you please;
And so I found myself quite soon uncommonly at home,
Demothin' all my business through to Cousin Jerobo'am.

He listened very docile like, an' hadn't much to say;
But what he did was ventured in a satisfact'ry way;
He'd covered somewhat from his kin, an' sort of lost the run,
But he recalled the Stebbinses, when mentioned, one by one,
An' talkin' him beside an' out, out family scarcely came
A relative more seldom' than Jerobo'am Jones.

He's teacher in a Sunday school, he told me, by-the-way,
Which has a room, above a store, that's open every day
"For if," he says, "we come across a child that needs our care,
We can not wait till Sunday come—we jes' 'en then an' there.
An' if you want to see the way our weekly cause is run,
Come in an' take a little look—our "social" 's just begun."

The onlookers hadn't come, to yet; the Superintendent, though,
Was sittin' at a table like, an' looked extremely low,
An' heard the praise on poor old me my cousin had to tell,
An' said he joyed to meet a friend of one he loved so well,
An' I talked back; an' for a time our conversee did not cease—
A regular three-cornered gush of friendship, love, an' peace.

An' then he showed me how they run them "grab-bags" an' all such
(We have the same at home, you know, although not next so much);
An' then he had some saf'sides on numbers that you saw,
With figures correspondin'ly, in envelopes, to draw;
I got how fifty cents to help a cause I dearly held,
An' drew a velvet hymn-book, with a clasp resemblin' gold.

My cousin pressed my hand with some congratulatin' jokes,
And said, "Ah me! the Stebbinses ones always lucky folks!
But after all, their shrewdness is the thing that lets them win."
(Which made me proud, though I didn't see just where the shrewd came in.
But buyin' a five-dollar book at that awkward-of price,
An' helpin' of the cause nemmine, was unexpected vice.)

Wherout the Superintendent said, "You're lucky, I allow.
I'll have to charge five dollars for a chance to draw here now."

Wherout my cousin Jerobo'am remarked, "If 'tain't wrong,
I'll buy a draw for Cousin Stub, to help the cause along."
I shook my head, but he would do't; an' one or I'm alive,
I drawed a good ten dollar bill for Cousin Jones's five!

Wherout the Superintendent said, "You're lucky men, I vow;
A hundred dollars I most charge for every drawing now";
An' fingerin' the envelopes, one opened—just a grain—
And I discerned the number 11, uncommon black and plain;
An' on the other number 11 by glancin' I could see
Five good crisp hundred-dollar bills a-waitin' there for me.

To make four hundred dollars clear, an' help the children too,
Was somethin' that would surely seem desirable to do;
With an unfailin' eagle eye, a heart that swelled with hope,
I watched, an' saw the very place he put that envelope;
I winked at Cousin Jerobo'am, I counted out the cash,
An' drawed, an' had that card revealed almost as quick to flash.

Oh, ashes!—the second figure I had what I hadn't seen,
A last that made it to a 21 'twas Number 17!
An' on them figures on the board there nothin' was, in fact,
Except a little pamphlet like—an auld gumbilin' tract;
Which hadn't any money worth, an' won't be good for much,
Except to keep my older boys from playin' cards on' such.

Now Cousin Jerobo'am Jones was buried in surprise,
An' walked a half a mile with me, an' helped phaenoptilize;
An says, "You come some other day—we'll try the thing again—
We come 'thin part of one of it—the next time we shall win."
Then, seein' to a corner, he took kindly leave a' me,
Because of some new scholars there that he must go an' see.

I give you this experience, John, but please don't tell it now;
Let Tompkins take the chestnut horse, an' sell the brindle cow;
An' gather up what cash besides I have a-goin' loose,
An' send the whole of it to me for my immediate use.
Do everything concerned in it in soft, secretive tones;
Direct it to New York, in care of Jerobo'am Jones.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

THE election of Senator EDMUNDS as President of the Senate elevates to the legal succession to the Presidency the most eminent Republican in Congress. It was the pleasure of his predecessor, Mr. DAVIS, to separate himself, a little ostentatiously, from party association, and to proclaim a peculiar independence, as if independence were incompatible with party sympathy and preference. To be a Republican or a Democrat is not, however, to take the responsibility of everything that Republicans or Democrats may do. It is to say only that the principles, the traditions, and the tendencies of one or the other party are more approved. Mr. EDMUNDS has been always a positive Republican, and for many years he has been the most weighty Republican advocate in the Senate. His speech for the Electoral Commission Bill in 1877 contained the whole argument, and the weight of his individual opinion gave it immense force. He has the independence of assured conviction. His intellectual quality is singularly firm and incisive. He is entirely at home in a Parliamentary body, and his long career is absolutely untouched by a hint of self-seeking. No higher tribute could be paid to any public man than the universal conviction in 1876, amid all the intrigues and plots for the Presidential nomination, that he meant what he said in declaring that he did not desire it.

Mr. EDMUNDS is fifty-five years old, and he has sat in the Senate for seventeen years. During that long term his constructive talent has been as evident as his ascendency in debate and his mastery of Constitutional law. He is not an orator, but he is a thoroughly equipped debater, an acute and remorseless critic of fallacy and fiction and ignorance, with a memory like a well-ordered arsenal, in which every weapon stands brightly burnished and ready for instant use. His elevation to the Presidency of the Senate was but a fitting honor from his party associates, and it properly fills the gap—which would have been perilous had it been left unfilled—produced by the expiration of Mr. DAVIS's Senatorial term.

The most striking fact in the career of Mr. EDMUNDS is that while he is one of the most conspicuous, constant, and positive participants in the discussions of the Senate, and a "regular" Republican, there is no Republican leader who is so universally acceptable to the party. In 1880 he was understood not to be averse to the third-term project, yet he was the choice of the strongest anti-third-termers. He is neither of feverishly "Stalwart" nor "Half-breed." Among Republican chiefs his position is unique, and it is due to the fact that he holds himself entirely aloof from the wretched business of spoils. His position was not made by patronage, and it does not depend upon a "machine." His ascendency is actual, not factitious. His State is justly proud of him, as Massachusetts was formerly proud of WEBSTER, and afterward of SUMNER, and, like them, he takes his own course. He is, however, very conservative of the traditions of the Senate and of its powers. His mind is too acute not to see the reason of reform, and he is too just not to admit it, but his temperament sometimes protests, so that he may be called a reformer if he can have his own way. This habit is doubtless often trying to his associates, and leads to the charge of hypercriticism. But Mr. EDMUNDS was one of the earliest friends of reform in the civil service, and the bill offered by Mr. PENDLETON in 1880 was substantially the one that was proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS ten years before. Probably his chair in the Senate is more agreeable to Mr. EDMUNDS than that of presiding officer, and it is possible that upon the re-assembling of the Senate in December next he may prefer to relinquish his new honor. But whether upon the floor or in the Presidency of the Senate, Mr. EDMUNDS is the Republican leader of whom his whole party is proud.

A LESSON FROM LATE EVENTS.

THE misfortune of the recent change in the Naval Office at New York is that it discredits the reformed system established by Congress, and with which Mr. BURT was more identified than any officer in the service. This misfortune is not changed by the fact that he was nominated to be Chief Examiner under that law. A little reflection will show that if Mr. BURT had accepted the Chief Examinership his acquiescence would have produced the false impression that he and those who believe with him held his displacement and the appointment to the Naval Office of an opponent of the new system to be in accordance with the principles of reform. This, however, although it would have given the retiring officer a place, would have been a kind of treachery, and his honest loyalty to the cause required that his declination should reveal the whole unfortunate aspect of the change.

Its effect upon the service is evident. Here are the heads of two departments in the customs: one discharges his routine official duties, is unfriendly to reform, and cultivates political influence; the other makes his office a model of order and efficiency, promotes reform so vigorously that it becomes the strong practical argument for the action of Congress, and finally but politely repels all political interference with the management of his office. The former officer is retained and promoted in the customs service. The latter is bowed out by the offer of another place at a third of his previous salary. What effect will this proceeding produce upon the service? Will the officers infer that the way to retention and promotion lies in honest adhesion to reform, or in the cultivation of political influence and support? What effect will it produce upon the general opinion of the President's attitude toward the reform which really depends upon him?

It serves no purpose to point out the fact that a great many excellent postmasters have been renominated. That is true, but some excellent postmasters have not been renominated, and some purely political changes in post-offices have been made. What is the fair conclusion? Is it not that the principle determining the Executive action was not the reform principle which requires that good officers be continued, but the spoils principle which demands that the places be used as personal and partisan prizes? It was certainly right to re-appoint all good postmasters. But to re-appoint some and to drop others simply proves that the action is not determined by the principle of regarding the fitness of the officer, but by some consideration of political or personal interest. In the same way it was undoubtedly right to retain the Surveyor in the customs service, if he had shown himself to be a vigorous and efficient officer. Were he acceptable he might well have been re-appointed. But the same argument applied to the Naval Office. To substitute the Surveyor for the Naval Office, and to offer to the latter what was under the circumstances virtually a dismissal, was a departure from the fundamental principle of reform. There has been always a great deal of skepticism in the Custom-house about the reformed system. The results were evident and undeniable, but stories of the dishonesty of the examinations, which we know to be untrue, have been freely circulated in official circles. It will now be harder than ever for the Custom-house circles to believe that the reform is really favored by the Administration, and that is unfortunate both for the Administration and for reform.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE AND THE LATE PETITION.

THE response of the trustees of Columbia College to the moderate and respectful request of the imposing petition presented to them a few weeks since is probably quite as favorable as was expected. It could hardly have been supposed that the most conservative of our colleges would at once take the most advanced position upon the subject proposed to it. The petition did not ask for co-education. It simply requested the trustees to consider how the many and great benefits of education in Columbia College may be extended to such properly qualified women as may desire it by admitting them to lectures and examinations, which does not necessarily involve co-education.

This the report of the committee admits, and then frankly expresses the sympathy of the trustees with the desire evinced by the petition to improve the methods and elevate the standards of the education of women. But for Columbia College to take practical steps to this end, it appears, would require the establishment of another school in addition to its present schools, and thus its straitened resources will not allow. To meet the burden of its debt and to sustain the schools already established is all that the means of the college now authorize it to undertake. But, despite poverty, something can be done, and the trustees therefore propose to announce a course of study to be pursued for three years, in which reviews and examinations shall be held by the faculty of Columbia, with proper diplomas and certificates to be awarded by the college. This is the beginning of an "annex" like that at Harvard, and the report of Mrs. AGASSIZ upon that enterprise, which was made a week or two since, is most timely, and well deserves the attention of the trustees of Columbia College and of all who are interested in the question.

Since the Harvard Annex was established the number of students has averaged from thirty-five to forty, who are chiefly young women preparing to be teachers or older women who are already teachers, but who wish to carry their education further; with these are a few others who study because they have the instinct of scholars, and enjoy it. There are no "flighty students," and Mrs. AGASSIZ says that "certain anxieties respecting the presence of young women as students in a university town, without constant oversight of their daily lives, have vanished on near approach." The students manifest no desire for co-education. The element of competition with men does not enter into their aims. They simply want the best education they can get, and they seek it at Harvard because the means to that end exist there. "The Annex is now incorporated, a fund is partly subscribed for its endowment, and when that is secured the Annex will be offered to the college, which will undoubtedly receive it if properly endowed. It will be distinctly a woman's college, like Newnham and Girton in England. What has thus been done in English Cambridge and at Harvard will presently undoubtedly be done at Columbia and at all other great universities. Nothing is plainer than that public opinion is rapidly hastening to secure to women the same opportunities of intellectual development which men enjoy, and to concede to them an equal right of choice as to the scope and extent of their education.

GREEN, THE ENGLISH HISTORIAN.

THE death of the historian JOHN RICHARD GREEN was not unanticipated, and it removes one of the most accomplished of English historical students, whose large and smaller Histories of the English People will long remain the most popular and satisfactory story of England. Its comprehension of the true spirit of the nation, its picturesque details of the various interests and life of the people, and its charming simplicity of style combine to form a work in the best modern spirit.

GREEN'S accomplishments as a scholar and his literary sagacity are equally striking. It was most fortunate that a man who knew English history so thoroughly also understood how to tell it briefly and in due proportion, yet without sacrifice of interest and literary charm. Mr. MORRISON, in his late admirable monograph upon MACAULAY in the "English Men of Letters," says that his great distinction was the ability to tell a fascinating story. This is hardly less true of GREEN, and if the reader misses upon his page something of the rich and splendid narrative of MACAULAY, he is consoled by the consciousness of a sounder judgment and a severer literary conscience.

The desultory literary sketches of Mr. GREEN, which have been also collected into a volume, reveal the same personal charm which is somehow conveyed by his more elaborate works. He was an author of whom very little was personally known, yet for whom his readers had a warm personal feeling. His death is a great loss to scholarship and letters, yet he had the good fortune to complete a great historical work and to secure good fame.

EMERSON AND CARLYLE.

SINCE the correspondence of GOETHE and SCHILLER no literary correspondence has been published so interesting and significant as that between CARLYLE and EMERSON. The first of the good fortunes of the book is its editing. It was the wish of both the correspondents that when the time should come, Mr. CHARLES ELIOT NORTON, the friend of both, and, with EMERSON, the trustee of CARLYLE's bequest of books to Harvard College, should edit the correspondence; and this work he has now done with absolute tact. He saw that the work needed an other editing than a careful arrangement of the letters, with a short account of the first meeting of the two men, drawn from their own record, and an occasional note upon some person or event mentioned. This he has supplied, with a final sentence mentioning the date of their last meeting and of their deaths; and this is, wisely, all.

The correspondence is one of the most intrinsically valuable of recent books, and a permanent contribution to literature. In all that has been written about CARLYLE—and the mass is enormous, both of his own Reminiscences and of all the books and essays—he appears now here more truly than in these perfectly intimate writings. The impression which they produce will certainly correct some false impressions which have been derived from much that has been printed since his death. In these letters, more clearly than elsewhere, can be seen and felt the deep, melancholic humor, with all its wild, grotesque, and rich extravagance of expression, which was the characteristic quality of CARLYLE's extraordinary genius, and which is so often mistaken for misanthropy. Nothing, again, is finer than the apprehension of this upon the part of EMERSON. His clear perception of his friend's great genius, his reverence for its insight, his patience with its whimsicalities, his own independence wholly untouched by his affectionate admirations, and drawing from CARLYLE the truest love and respect that he felt for any of his contemporaries, are all not only nobly characteristic of EMERSON, but the record of them forms one of the noblest chapters in the history of friendship.

Over EMERSON'S letters breaks that sampler ether, that distant air of the immortals, which WORDSWORTH celebrates, and no contrast could be more vivid than that between the cheerful serenity of his mind and temperament and the tumultuous sadness of CARLYLE. Nothing, too, will be more pleasantly surprising to many readers than the shrewd tenacity with which EMERSON from the first insisted upon securing to his friend some pecuniary return from the sale of his works in this country. We can not mention this very remarkable book, full of intimate personal revelations of two of the greatest men of our time, each of whom more deeply affected the thought and literature of his own country than any contemporary.

VALDEMAR RAASLÖFF.

THOSE who were so fortunate as to know General RAASLÖFF during his residence in this country as the Minister of Denmark will have heard with sincere regret of his death at Passy, near Paris, on the 14th of February. General RAASLÖFF was profoundly interested in all public questions, and he was a very able and eminent diplomatist, a man of many accomplishments, of charming manners, and of a singularly clear and alert mind. He began life as a soldier, and came of fine to this country as a civil engineer. His ability readily distinguished him, and he became Minister. During the war he and the Swedish Minister, Count PIPER, lived together in Washington, and were both sincere and intelligent friends of the Union.

Before the war ended, General RAASLÖFF was sent upon a special mission to China, where he formed a warm friendship with Sir FREDERICK BRUCE, who was afterward British Minister at Washington. RAASLÖFF returned to this country, and Mr. SEWARD proposed to him the St. Thomas treaty. While the negotiations were pending he was called home as Minister of War, and interested himself earnestly in the treaty, making a visit to this country to confer with its friends, and upon the non-action of the Senate he resigned his portfolio, and his public life ended.

Since that time he has lived little in Denmark, but with his family has resided in Germany, Italy, and France, a sagacious student of public affairs, whose views were much prized by statesmen, and always a delightful and instructive companion. His letters, full of knowledge of the real movement of affairs and of incisive criticism, were of the very best, and it was hard to think that Denmark was losing the service of so accomplished a son. He remembered this country with interest and affection, although he was essentially a European, and his friends here shared in the rich overflow of his sparkling observation and comment upon the life around him. For some time he had been declining in health, and he died at last in perfect tranquillity, his wife and only daughter in tender attendance, but his only son was far on the Western frontier of America. In the memory of all who knew him, VALDEMAR RAASLÖFF will be always a most striking and interesting figure.

ART COMPETITION.

AN announcement at the head of the editorial page will be read with great interest by all young students of art. The purpose of the proposal will commend itself to all who watch with admiration and hope the rapid development of the art of wood illustration, and the conditions are most reasonable. The poem selected for illustration is one which readily lends itself to picturesque design, and the character of the judges is the guarantee of the most intelligent and considerate award. The designs will, of course, be viewed as those of young students, and not of accomplished and mature artists, and every honest competitor may be sure of fair treatment. We anticipate an exceedingly interesting competition, with results most favorable to the beautiful art in which American genius is already unsurpassed.

A RECENT SERIOUS EVENT.

THE friends of fair play have every right to be aggrieved by the treatment which Commander GORRINGE received from the Navy Department, and which the newspapers have made familiar to the public. As the naval career is chosen for life, it is a very serious event when an officer is driven to resignation by what he conceives to be the unfair conduct of a Secretary, whose position is but temporary, and the Secretary's conduct must be plainly just, or he will be properly held guilty of an immense injustice.

That is undoubtedly the general verdict upon Secretary CHANDLER'S part in the GORRINGE correspondence. The Secretary states that he had heard a disheartening report, upon which he based a peremptory inquiry, and upon receiving a complete denial, which he is obliged to concede to be satisfactory, instead of closing the correspondence with that statement, he says in effect that he had become he had heard that Commander GORRINGE was selling to foreigners opinions injurious to his country, but that there is no objection to naval officers expressing opinions which are not paid for. The insinuation contained in the reply was stinging to an honorable man, and it was one which the Secretary clearly had no right to make. Commander GORRINGE replied that of course he could have had no suspicion that the Secretary's inquiry was based upon a suggestion of corruption, and that, with all other officers, he had relied upon the Department to protect him against dishonorable imputations. Resisting the facts, he added that such a suggestion could have been made only by a corrupt, unscrupulous, and malicious steward, and since he had been officially informed by the Secretary of such a charge, he begged respectfully to know from whom it proceeded. The reply was an order to Commander GORRINGE to report at Washington. He obeyed promptly, but asked in vain for charges or orders, and he then wrote to the President resigning his commission. Upon the face of the letters as published the Secretary seems to us to have assisted in the most wanton manner a naval officer of high standing and meritorious service. It is impossible to see how he could honorably refuse to give to Commander GORRINGE the name of the author of the injurious suggestion, who must have seemed to the Secretary a person of credibility, or he could not decently have made the suggestion the basis of a peremptory inquiry. The Secretary, without any necessity whatever, chose to allude to the charge. A permanent refusal to explain further must certainly strain severely his future relations with self-respecting officers of the navy.

THE LONGFELLOW MEMORIAL.

THE Longfellow Memorial Association, which proposes to secure a strip of land in front of LONGFELLOW'S house upon which to erect a monument of some kind, has been agreeably surprised by a letter from Mr. ERNEST W. LONGFELLOW and his sisters, the children of the poet, offering to convey the land for the purpose mentioned. This generous act of course greatly facilitates the execution of the plan. The ground will be properly laid out, and a statue will be erected facing the Charles—

> "River that so gently winkest
> Through the meadows calm and free,
> Till at length thy rest thou findest
> In the bosom of the sea."

The fame of LONGFELLOW will be always associated with this placid stream, upon whose shores, at a little distance removed, he lived so long in the historic house in which the most famous of his poems were written. No more fitting and interesting memorial could be designed than the quiet green meadow, with its walks and seats commanding the view that LONGFELLOW loved, and the statue of the poet whose genius has given to it a pensive and endearing charm.

COMPLETION OF THE SARATOGA MONUMENT.

THE monument at Schuylerville, on the field of BURGOYNE'S surrender, is now substantially completed. It is 154 feet high, standing upon a bluff about 250 feet above the Hudson. The river is there a comparatively narrow stream, the landscape graceful and gentle, and the site is extremely picturesque. The monument is a tower commanding a broad and beautiful prospect. It is to be decorated with statues of SCHUYLER, GATES, and MORGAN, and a vacant niche will be inscribed with the name of ARNOLD, who was the hero of the day. Within the tower there will be historic antablatures. The grounds are some three acres in extent, amply laid.

The completion of the monument will be celebrated some time during the year. This occasion, with the culmination at Newburgh, will recall to the public mind the fact that the Revolutionary war was largely a military struggle for the control of the Hudson, and that the defeat and surrender of BURGOYNE was really the culminating event, leading to the alliance of France, and final victory.

"The field of the grounded arms," as HALLECK called it, had its centenary in 1877, when the corner-stone of the monument was laid. But the completion of the work delayed also the observances, and with that and the Newburgh ceremonies the great series of Revolutionary reminiscence will end.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev. Dr. HENRY C. COFFIN in a recent address expressed his regret that the Church had not done [illegible] to provide young women to earn their own living. It is cruel, he said, that the Christianity that shines around his fireside and his sketching-room to-day should shut in her face the door that opens to emancipation. The shackles [illegible] be stricken not only from the hands and feet of women, but also from their brains.

—The Rev. Dr. JOHN HALL maintains that Siberia is the most fertile district of Russia, and that many of the exiles become the richest and most prosperous people of the empire.

—The Countess of Chesterfield has erected in an English church a memorial tablet to the late Lord BEACONSFIELD, inscribed as follows: "In memory of BENJAMIN DISRAELI, Earl of Beaconsfield, the foremost man of his age. Eminent in letters, in council, in debate, a statesman far-seeing and sagacious, a patriot zealous for his country's honor, a devoted servant of the Queen, by whom he was trusted, honored, and mourned. This tablet is erected by ANNE ELIZABETH, Countess of Chesterfield—a record of a much prized friendship and a lasting regret. 'A wise man's heart discovereth both time and judgment'—Ecclesiastes, viii 5." Lord BEACONSFIELD was once reported to be engaged to the countess.

—The late F. G. STRANAHAN, editor of the Cuba (New York) Patriot, requested, during his last illness, that at his funeral his friends should sing "Marching through Georgia" on their way to his grave, and "Rock by, my Lord," when leaving it. His wishes were complied with.

—The inmates of the Eddystone Light-house are in danger from the waves, from fire, and from starvation. Recently their food became reduced to a biscuit or two, and they were compelled to subsist on the oil that supplied their lamps.

—Says Lady FREDERICK CAVENDISH, whose husband was lately murdered in Dublin: "I pray that neither the unspeakable greatness of my sorrow nor the terrible wickedness of those men may ever blind either myself or any of the English people to the duty of patience, justice, and sympathy, in thoughts, words, and deeds, with regard to Ireland and its people at large."

—Lord SHAFTESBURY writes to the Countess GARFARIN that the doings of the Salvation Army seem to him to be "a work of the devil, who, having for a long time tried to render Christianity odious, has changed his tactics, and is attempting to make it ridiculous."

—A collection of more than five hundred sketches and studies in Flanders was sold recently in London. Among them were illustrations to the Iliad and Odyssey, Ecclyclon, and the Book of Enoch.

—Of Mr. WHISTLER'S latest "arrangement" of fifty-one etchings in a London gallery the Pall Mall Gazette says: "What really characterizes this collection is the charming leppery by which it is surrounded. The gallery is hung with golden-yellow velvet and lemon yellow muslin; the floor is carpeted with yellow matting. Visitors are invited to sit on settees covered with yellow serge, or on perilous little cane-bottomed chairs painted canary-color. The mirrors themselves are framed in white frames, and hung far apart upon walls covered with white felt. Everything is white and yellow, and the catalogues of the exhibition are handed around by a dejected attendant in a fancy dress of white and yellow. There are rows of little yellow pots, each containing one little yellow flower."

—Mr. JOHN MORLEY declares that reform is always in the air when Mr. GLADSTONE is in power, and that the present British government, though not as advanced as he could wish, is the most advanced that has ever appeared in England.

—"Speaking broadly," observes the London Spectator, "we may say that a disagreeable sound or color is disagreeable to every one, while we have to inquire after our neighbors' tastes before we know what flavors they would consider agreeable or disagreeable; everybody dislikes the screech of a slate pencil, and nobody is surprised at another person's not sharing his own preference for a particular flavor. Most people have felt at some time or other when wine was exported by the dying man who, when told that he was going where the wicked would cease from troubling, responded, earnestly, 'And the good too, I hope.'"

—"A. K. H. B.," the veteran author of Recreations of a Country Parson, says in his new volume, Toward Sunset: "It has been very strongly pressed upon me in these last years that not merely the old in many cases wish to have as little as possible worship as is decently possible, but that the young—I mean children and lads and girls—have lost much of the old simple-minded enjoyment in going to church."

—Mr. JOHN FOSTER, who has for several years ably filled the responsible position of editor-in-chief of the New York Times, has assumed control of the Brooklyn Union-Argus, which he has practically had to conduct for several months. Under its new management the Union-Argus will continue to represent and support Republican ideas and principles, and Mr. FOSTER'S well-known ability as an editor, his force and brilliancy as a writer, and his long and intimate acquaintance with politics can not fail to insure the success of the enterprise.

—Mr. A. E. KENT, of San Francisco, a member of the class of '33 at Yale, has given to the college $60,000, which the Faculty has decided shall be used in erecting a chemical laboratory, which will be begun this spring and finished in the fall.

—"The most brilliant novelist America now possesses" is, says the Saturday Review, Mr. W. D. HOWELLS.

—A case of suttee, on which learning, recently occurred at Dharwar, in Jeypore, India, the victim being the widow of the chief of the village. For abetting the act the sons and brothers of the chief have been sentenced to imprisonment for seven years.

—One of the customs of the Fruiterers' Company of London is to present to the Lord Mayor each year an assortment of all the choice fruit of the season, and in return the Lord Mayor gives them a complimentary banquet.

—A Berlin correspondent writes that as an orator BISMARCK may be compared with CROMWELL. He has no rhetorical action; his gestures are not graceful; his voice, a tenor, is neither musical nor imposing. He stammers, he coughs, he often stops for a word—it is always the right one when he has found it—while some of his sentences are terribly involved, and rarely a foot long. But as a orator he may be compared with LUTHER or with SCHILLER. For being Germans can write their mother-speech more clearly, more idiomatically, more gracefully, more expressively, than their great political chief.

—The Right Hon. J. CHAMBERLAIN, M.P., considers the legal profession as the most democratic of all the professions: "merit, industry, and ability are the passports to success. Nowhere have birth or station or inherited advantages less influence than in connection with this career."

—The famous missionary, HENRY MARTYN, had an affair of the heart with Miss LYDIA GRENFELL, of Cornwall. In one of his letters, written from India in 1809, he refers to a proposition that she should go to Canopore and marry him: "I do not expect that, though all obstacles were removed, she would ever become mine unless I came for her, and I now do not wonder at it, though I did before. If any one of my sisters had had such a proposal made to her, I would never have consented to her going. So you may see that the affair is ended between us. . . . She need not imagine that I may form another attachment, for, after one disappointment, I am not likely to try my chance again." But with extreme merciful he immediately adds, "If I do, I will give her the earliest intelligence of it."

—The late Mr. SAMUEL R. GIFFORD has received in this country so little recognition, in comparison with his deserts, that his friends will be pleased to learn that the London Academy, judging his oil paintings by some recently published illustrations, declares that "S. R. GIFFORD was a much greater master of atmospheric effect than J. M. W. TURNER." But then in America we never half appreciate a native artist until some foreigner tells us how good he is.

—For those who love CROMWELL'S memory (observes one of his contemporaries) it is perhaps better that he should lie in an unknown grave, for, had he remained in his first resting place, sacrilegious hands might have been busied with his bones, measuring the cranial capacity of that rugged skull, and grasping with profane fingers the arm that once wielded the sword of the Lord and of Gideon. Now neither idle curiosity nor scientific research can desecrate the grave of him who taught Englishmen that freedom must be deserved before it can be permanently gained.

—Mr. JOSEPH COAT declares that the law of averages, as established in the experience of life-insurance companies during the last forty years, has once for all triumphantly justified the temperance principle of total abstinence. "Among serious and thoroughly well-informed persons debate on this matter is over. Yes, my luxurious friend, you, my moderate drinker in the pulpit, you are marked men, branded, bracketed and bedoted."

—The Saturday Review comes at last to the defense of an American author against his countrymen: "When Mr. JAMES published Daisy Miller, every English reader recognized that he had sketched, not the typical 'young girl' of America, but a peculiar example of the Extreme Left of young girls. Daisy Miller was the most neglected sort of young girl run wild, and transported into an extremely unrealistic European environment. But many American readers (being touchy) did not see this, but supposed that Mr. JAMES wished emphatically to libel and satirize his country's brightest jewel, the typical American young girl. There was no cause to Boston, and quashing it pone in critical circles of New York."

—In discussing the nature of the [illegible] art, Mr. J. COMYNS CARR observes that there are "marked [illegible] of style and manner which, even in the [illegible] of the artist in his best moments, he inappropriate to the [illegible] they are [illegible] it is this inevitable [illegible] of the artist in his best moments, which, seeking, considered as a [illegible] for the [illegible] of [illegible] conveyance [illegible] of poetry, the most difficult [illegible] of [illegible] The painter can take [illegible] his model just so much [illegible] the purposes of his picture; he may assume the inspiration [illegible] ality without making himself be seen; but the [illegible] an ideal to attain is not at every turn be the hinderance [illegible] of his own personality, and from this there is no possible escape."

TATUE OF ROBERT FULTON.

A new statue of Robert Fulton, by Mr Bow n Brenner, of Philadelphia, was placed in the e Hall of Representatives in Washington on 26th of February. It presents a strong const to the other statues in the hall, owing to e realistic and unconventional manner of treat-nt adopted by the sculptor. He has wisely tained from the classic style in his representan of this typical American. The great invent-r is not presented to us in the garb of an anient Greek or Roman, and at the same time the ist has avoided the stiff and ungainly effect of dern costume. He has represented Fulton ting upon an old-fashioned chair, in his shirt eeves, instantly studying a model of the steamer ermont, which rests upon his knees. The attide and expression are very characteristic of the

HE LATE GOVERNOR STEPHENS.

The funeral of the late Governor Stephens, of orgia, which took place in Atlanta on the 8th st., was one of the most imposing pageants at was ever witnessed in the State. "It would em," writes the correspondent of the New York erald, "that almost the whole people of this ction of country had come together to pay their ast of respect to the memory of the late Gov-nor Stephens, who for more than fifty years has en a leading power in Georgia and the South.
e feeling of affection for the memory of Mr ephens is intensified by the fact that of the ur great statesmen—Robert Toombs, Herschel V. Johnson, Lucius Q. Rhett, Stephens, ones, and Brown—only the two last-named ntlemen are left. The city was draped with ourning and every place of business was closed, hile the bells were constantly tolling. Delega-ons from over one hundred cities and counties e present. Special trains were running every ll hour during the day loaded down with visi-
rs. The military display was the largest ever en in the State, and for the first time the white d colored regiments of Georgia marched in the me column, a threatened difference on this ad having been settled by putting the cavalry of artillery between the white and the colored fantry. It was estimated at twelve o'clock that enty people were in the city."

The body of the deceased Governor lay in state the senate Chamber from daybreak until three clock in the afternoon. The chamber was ndsomely draped and decorated, and the funerl casket-rich, in which the statesman was now posing, stood beside the coffin, covered with owers. A company of military served as a ard of honor, and kept in line the crowd of ople that passed through the chamber, at the te of seventy persons a minute, for hours.

The memorial services were held in the hall of e House of Representatives, which at an early hour was packed to its utmost capacity. So great was the pressure to obtain admittance that the military were ordered to keep back the crowd at the point of the bayonet, in order to prevent dangerous crush and perhaps a panic. Senator Colquitt presided, and several touching addresses were made by popular orators, but the interest of the day centred in the speech of General Robert Toombs, who was the nearest friend of the late Governor. General Toombs is now almost totally blind, and his once erect and stately form is bent with age and infirmities. "When I rose to speak," says the correspondent from whom we have already quoted, "he was completely overcome. He bowed his head on his hand, and the tears trickled through his fingers. For fully two minutes he could not say a word. His address was an eloquent eulogy of the life and character of the deceased.

The procession that followed the body to the grave was at least a mile and a half in length. The hearse, surmounted by a large floral design and covered with nodding plumes, was drawn by eight jet black horses, each led by a negro groom in livery. Large detachments of the state military, the Governor's staff, members of the State departments, the judicial officials, the legislature, civic societies, and private citizens, composed the procession. The Savannah Volunteers carried the flag of the State of Georgia—the flag presented by law a few months since, and presented at the sesquicentennial by the company by Governor Stephens, who simply said, "Never let it be trailed in the dust." A notable feature was a delegation of Confederate citizens and soldiers from Augusta, sent up at the expense of that city. Seven bands of music were stationed in the procession.

The tops of buildings, windows, balconies, piazzas, and every available porch were black with human beings, while the streets were like rest[less] people, through which the detachments of police had to force a way for the procession. The scene was a grand one as the military part of the procession filled Broad Street from one end to the other. It was such a sight as the people of Georgia had never seen, and will not soon witness again. The marvel of it was that, as a bystander expressed it, "the tiny and frail man, scarcely sixty pounds of flesh, a mere speck, powerless in death as in life, had evoked so grand and so impressive a demonstration."

At the grave the services were brief and simple. General Toombs, Senator Brown, Governor Colquitt and the other pall bearers deposited the casket in the crypt. The Rev. Henry Deems, chaplain of the Senate, delivered a discourse. Dr. Dr. Witt Talmage was offered a prayer, and Bishop Beckwith read the services. It was almost dark before the earth was thrown upon the grave, and it was quite dark when the immense crowd of people wended their way back to the city. Among the last to leave the scene was General Toombs, who sobbed like a child, exclaiming, "Poor Alex!" He was the truest man I ever knew."

THE DEATH OF THE LATE GOVERNOR STEPHENS LYING IN STATE.—From a Sketch by Theodore Wust.

THE NEW COTTON EXCHANGE AT NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans sells less cotton than New York, but she handles far more—at least one-fourth of the cotton crop, the estimate for which during 1882–3 is seven millions of bales. The great market for phantom cotton is New York; the great "spot-cotton" market, or market for real and tangible cotton, is New Orleans. By the 25th of August, 1882, dating from the 1st of September previous, New York had sold 21,974,600 bales, while between September, 1881, and October, 1882, the New Orleans sales amounted to 15,700,400 bales. Forty millions of bales have been sold in New York during a single year, a crop of between five and six millions being resold there half a dozen times over and more. Since the organization of the Cotton Exchange in New Orleans, some thirteen years ago, the commerce in phantom cotton, or "futures," has been steadily increasing, but the Southern market will not be able for many years to rival the great Eastern metropolis in the enormity of its cotton speculation. So much, however, has the business of the New Orleans Exchange increased as to render necessary the erection of the new and splendid edifice pictured by Mr Davidson's pencil upon another page. The sales of futures now average between 25,000 and 100,000 bales a day.

Rightfully proud as New Orleans cotton men are of their new building, the old one will not be abandoned altogether without regret. It was a queer, quaint, eccentric building, having all manner of curious entrances front and rear, and flanked by the most original courts, perhaps, in the city. One entered these courts through a side alley, and the angular projections of architecture supported by slender pillars, the immense windows of sample-rooms, the angles formed by warehouses huddling shoulder to shoulder in hollow square as if preparing to resist attack, were positively delightful. Color aided the effect, blue and white tints alternating, and relieved to one court by a pleasant patch of green lawn in the centre. The rear of the Exchange itself was bright and cheerful, the tones of light harmonized with the Southern character of the structure.

There is nothing Southern in the style of the new Exchange; it is like a splendid Northern visitor among the old-fashioned types standing about it at the corners of Carondelet and Gravier streets. The total height of the building, from the pavement to the summit of the clock tower, is 103 feet; the first story is 20 feet high, lighted by windows 22 feet high. The depth of the edifice is 107 feet, the width is 76 feet. The second and third stories have each a height of 16 feet, and the fourth of 15. Besides the front entrance to the hall on Carondelet Street, there are three others, two giving access to the Exchange from Gravier Street and by way of the curious alley on the north side, and another leading to the main stairway, which ascends to the fifth floor by a succession of broad flights. The Cotton Exchange proper occupies most of the first floor, covering a superficial area of 5800 square feet, but sufficient space has been left for an entresol between the first and second stories, through which the visitor may enter the handsome gallery on the east side of the hall.

The whole style is Renaissance—what the French would call Neo-grec. The base is white granite, quarried and cut at Hallowell, Maine, and the superstructure cellite limestone from Bedford, Indiana. The stairways are iron, and the balustrades and railings likewise; most of the building is fire-proof. Mr H Wagner, of Louisville, Kentucky, is the architect.

The façade is very handsome. Two graceful caryatides support the entablature above the main entrance; their attitude is at once elegant and dignified. These figures were chiselled in place. Above the second entablature, superimposed on the first, will be observed a very impressive group. The standing figure in the centre represents Industry about to place a wreath on the head of Agriculture—the strong nude figure reclining on the left. The reclining female on the right typifies Commerce, the anchor and cog-wheel indicate her two great aids to successful enterprise, just as the plough and the bee on the left-hand sculpture are the symbols of Agriculture. A cotton bale appears behind Commerce, and beneath the cornice of the entablature projects a shield bearing the arms of Louisiana in relief. The ornamentation of the façade is florid and very agreeable in its general effect, the modillions, the scroll-work of the freizes, the flutings and leaf carvings, offer a display of architectural richness unlike anything else in the city. Considering the excellent character of the structure, and the fact that all the material had to be sent from the North and West, the expenditure was not so large as might be imagined; by the time everything is complete the new Cotton Exchange will have cost about $400,000.

The interior is being frescoed in oil by Sullivan Brothers, of Chicago, who have several excellent German artists at work. The frescoing of the Cotton Exchange itself and of most of the building upstairs will be Renaissance—gold-yellow designs in relief upon a neutral ground. A pleasant departure from this uniformity will be made, however, in regard to the decoration of two committee rooms upon the second floor. One of these will be frescoed with Egyptian designs, full of strong colors and vivid contrasts; the other will be treated in Queen Anne style, much resembling what the French call rococo. The ceiling of the great exchange hall will be further graced by four large paintings measuring 10 by 15 feet, and set into panels upon a gold background. The expedition of De Soto, the discovery of Louisiana by La Salle, the mouth of the jetties, with ships entering and leaving, and a Mississippi River scene, will form the subject of these four paintings—the second two offering modern contrasts to the historical severity of the first two, and being juxtaposed accordingly.

Two hydraulic elevators will be soon in operation. The entire upper part of the edifice—excepting the two committee-rooms upon the second and the telegraph-room upon the fifth floor—will be rented out for offices. One railroad company has already rented a whole story. In the floor of the Cotton Exchange, not far from the rear entrance, a great circular basin has been contrived. This is the "Future Ring." Its centre will be occupied by a fountain.

The Cotton Exchange has now 425 members. Its annual receipts are $30,000 in excess of its expenditures, which are very large, for the cost of telegrams alone is $12,000 a year. The telegraph system of the Exchange claims to be the most complete in the world, and is really more exhaustive in minute detail than that of any other cotton exchange in America. Every pulsation in the myriad veins of the world's cotton commerce, whether in India, Egypt, or Europe, is recorded by the throbbing of its telegraphic needle. The visitor's eye may follow hourly upon the blackboards the movements of the earth's visible cotton supply by rail as steamer, may track each marked bale through all the mazes of "futures" speculation from port to port, from city to city, until it reaches the steel teeth of those cells which digest and assimilate it into manifestos forms of spun goods. There are kept the daily records of cotton exports from all markets, of cotton receipts at all ports, together with all possible weekly summaries and monthly statements. So perfect is the complicated machinery of this electric chronicle that mistakes are scarcely possible; those which do occur are quickly detected in the general movement of the reports, just as the Bank of England machinism cast out gold pieces of inferior weight. Nor must we forget the intricate machinery of the local cotton business constructed by the institution; the supervisors, reporters, messengers, levee inspectors; the host of employés occupied in watching, sampling, and protecting every bale from the moment of its advent to that of its final departure by steamer or by rail. It is worth while to glance at the principal managers of this vast institution.

John S. Phelps, President of the Cotton Exchange, has been elected no less than five times to that important office, and has held it four times, having once positively declined, for honorable motives, in spite of election, to accept the position. Mr Phelps is a native of Worcester County, Massachusetts. He went South in 1845, first to Arkansas, and finally to New Orleans, of which he has been a resident since 1851. While with the firm of Heald, Massie, & Co. he probably perfected his knowledge of the cotton business to a remarkable degree; but his subsequent success and popularity have been also largely due to his great capacity as an organizer, and the indisputable justice and rectitude of the position taken by him as a public man. He was an influential member of the Funding Board in 1875, and a member of the Constitutional Convention. A large share in the honor of having suppressed certain disreputable features of the "sampling" business in cotton is also due to Mr Phelps's energy and shrewdness as the head of the great institution with which he is now so intimately identified. He is a tall and dignified gentleman, of very kindly manner.

The Vice President of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, Mr Gilbert H. Gaskin, is the youngest ever elected to the office, being only thirty two years of age. But there are probably few in the world who know more about the cotton business than this young man with the keen black eyes. Mr Gaskin has an affability of manner rather European than American, and as he converses to three languages with equal facility, one might be puzzled on a first introduction to guess his nationality. He is a native of Manassas, Virginia, and a son of Charles Gaskin, a famous cotton factor of Savannah. Young Gaskin was brought up to the business from a boy, and sent to Europe to complete at once his education and his commercial training. He lived for some years in both Havre and Barcelona—the great French and Spanish cotton ports—and speaks the languages of both countries like mother tongues. In 1872 his father established a branch house in New Orleans, taking into one as partner into the business, thereafter carried on under the firm name of Charles A. Gaskin & Company. Mr Charles Gaskin left his son in charge of the New Orleans firm until 1881, when the venerable cotton merchant died.

Mr Henry G. Hester, the Superintendent and Secretary, is so well known throughout the country that it is scarcely necessary to speak of his energy and ability. He has retained the position he holds now since the organization of the Cotton Exchange, and in testimony of their esteem the members not long ago presented him with a generous share of stock in the institution. Mr Hester is a native of New Orleans. At the time the Cotton Exchange was first organized he was a reporter upon the Price Current, a well-known commercial journal, and his qualities as a commercial writer earned him the offer of the situation which he has since held uninterruptedly.

His assistant, Mr. R. C. Kerr—"Father Kerr," as all the "old stand-by" will him—has also been connected with the Exchange since its foundation. He had previously been a commercial writer upon the Crescent—a paper which has been dead for many years. "Father Kerr" is a native of North Carolina, and has almost reached his seventieth year, but appears to have but little of his energy and keenness of observation—a fine eagle-faced old man, wearing a long white beard.

APPROACHING THE TRUTH

CHAPTER XXV.

A LAST LOOK BACK.

There was something strange in the good wishes of John Woodhatch, something which those two women did not profess to comprehend. They glanced wistfully at him, but the face was no index to the thoughts of its owner; it was as set and immobile as the Egyptian Sphinx.

And yet it was not difficult to guess what were the thoughts of the master of Farm Forlorn, for all this new impressive attitude. He had told them only a few minutes since that he had lost faith in every living thing as completely as every human soul had lost trust in him. He accepted the position. Not all the protestations of Kitty and her mother could have altered his thoughts, they were going away from him, on a mission which they feared to communicate, and those whom he had befriended were turning from him forever. They were in grief, perhaps in doubt, but none the less was it black ingratitude to him, of this he was certain in his heart.

Here was his last disappointment, his crowning failure, and it was hardening him very quickly. He should have been trusted better, he was sure, but his pride would not let him utter any further reproaches. They did not want his advice—more, they did not want his money; all they wanted was to get away from him. So be it, he would not raise a finger against it. Let them go. He had wished them godspeed, he had hoped God would help them in the new dangers which they were rashly seeking for themselves, and thus was an end of it all. What were they lingering for, when time was of value to them and him? he wondered, though he did not put his thoughts into words.

"We will go away the stronger for your good wishes, sir," said Mrs Chadderton, "and—it is more than right we should go together. You know this?"

"It is right you should go with her—yes," he answered. "You can protect her if you will."

"If!"

"Ah, yes. I had forgotten you were her mother."

He paused a moment, then he said,

"What money have you?"

"Oh, sir, I have saved more money than I shall ever want, I hope. Don't talk to me of money," cried Mrs. Chadderton, "don't think that any money from you to me can pay the help you've been to me and her. Don't think—"

"There! there! I have said godspeed, and is as well to go before the servants rouse about you with a hundred questions," said John Woodhatch, interrupting her. "Thanks only weary me just now. And you have not much time to spare."

"You are offended with me," cried Kitty, "and yet it is as necessary I should go."

"Does your mother think so as well?"

"No," said Mrs. Chadderton, unnerving for her self, "but I have no power to stay her."

"So you go with her. Well, good-by."

"Presently, sir, I will explain," cried Kitty, "but I am not ungrateful to you, God he my witness here. Always in my prayers I shall remember you. And—Greg can not do without me. That is it—you see, sir. That is the only reason why I go away."

John Woodhatch nodded gravely, but he was unmoved by her protestations. He could have told her again that Greg having had his chance of escape, there was an end to Greg in every honest mind; but he knew what her reply would be, what it had already been. Greg was first and foremost ever in her thoughts, and the crime he had committed she, in her interest in him, could readily excuse, even ignore. Greg was everything—and he was nothing. Greg was the lover and the comforter, the old pal, perhaps the child-husband in the old awful times from which he had hoped he had rescued them forever, and to which they were hurrying back—poor storm-driven atoms of humanity, with never a hope for them after that day. He was only the patron, the benefactor; he had no power over them, and his influence weighed but as a feather in the balance. He had not even their confidence when the great troubles came, which he could have shared with them with all his heart if they had let him. After all, they were afraid of him. That was the miserable sequel to the misspent efforts of his life. Meaning for the best, and acting for the best, he had failed in all that he had undertaken, and there was not any one who cared a straw for him as what his wishes might be. The world was utterly selfish and base. And he was utterly alone in that world; there was only this old dog Carlo, who came slowly toward him and sat down at his side, he he felt was anything like a friend.

"It is hardly safe for Fledge to drive you over to the station, but you can have his services if you wish," he added, suddenly.

"No, sir; we will walk," said Kitty.

"It is a fine morning, and you are both good walkers," he remarked, coldly; "and your boxes?"

"They were sent to the station late last night."

"I did not know that. Has there I don't know what goes on in this house."

He turned away as if very tired of them, or very anxious to escape any further protestations of their gratitude or affection. They did not attempt to stay him by a word.

"He will think better of us presently," murmured Kitty; then she passed her arm through her mother's, and the two women went into the ante-lit room together. They looked back at the house of mourning, with the white blinds drawn before the windows, and the mother said, in a deep, low voice, and almost as in a last appeal,

"It is a hard time to desert him."

"Not desertion, mother. He will be happier without us, now it has come to this," Kitty answered.

"Ay! perhaps he may. Still, if you had waited till the funeral—"

Kitty wrung her hands together.

"There is no waiting, with Greg in danger, mother. The poor dead friend can wait patiently, but the living man asks me to come to him," said Kitty, "and is in terrible distress of mind."

"He has been in terrible distress of mind for years."

"Ah! true."

"And you love him?"

"Yes."

"And understand him, you say?"

"As no one else does in all the world."

"My faith in him is weak," muttered Mrs. Chadderton, "but my fear for you is very strong. And I have been waiting for you for so many years, child, as the master knows."

"Mother, why not let me go alone?" urged Kitty.

"No," cried Mrs Chadderton, pressing her daughter's hand to her side; "it is for the best. And, after all, it is only one more trouble of his life passing away from his home."

They turned again at the bend of the road, and looked for the last time at Farm Forlorn—a fair picture in the early morning, with the green trees rustling above the house roof, and the deep blue sky overhead, with the sun shining, and the birds darting to and fro. It was a last look at the old place, to be remembered in the after years of these two wanderers, who turned with their sad faces once more toward the old dark life. John Woodhatch had said, God help them in it, and they would need His help very much, and very soon, they knew.

And they saw not Farm Forlorn again. They had taken their last look at it indeed, as they passed away from its master to the benighted land lying beyond the peaceful life from which they turned away.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE MOVING OF THE HANDS.

CHAPTER I.

AFTER THE FUNERAL.

It was late summer weather still when they buried Hester Brake of Boston in her brother's grave in Skegs Shore church-yard. Kitty and her mother had been some two days then, and to all inquiries concerning them John Woodhatch had shrugged his shoulders and said, "Leave of absence." They had gone away with his permission, and it was nobody's business but their own, he supposed—at all events, not his. Parson Larcom and his daughter had their suspicions of these sudden flittings from the farm, but they did not trouble John Woodhatch with them. There was something in the farmer's new manner which did not invite—indeed, that repelled—confidence, "a dark hour" which wanted his visitors he was not at his best. Greg and Kitty had possibly made a runaway match of it—and for the mere sake of a runaway match, it appeared—and Mrs Chadderton had gone to give the bride away, as else there had been a quarrel between Greg and his master, and the women had started off to bring him back, and act as peace-makers, as women will do sometimes, thought Alec Larcom. At all events, they would know the truth in time. Never a worse man to keep his little troubles, his little plans, to himself than John Woodhatch of Farm Fnalorn. John's heart was too full to overflowing to hold its secrets long, the parson thought, not knowing his friend better than the rest of them, or at least not gauging to its depths the truth of his strange character.

It had been a quiet funeral in the old place, but there had been considerable interest evinced. Funerals were rare shows at Skegs Shore, and the master of Farm Forlorn had been expected to make a brave display, it being the first "turnout" from the farm in his time. Morris had not been buried thence, and our Morris's sister—duchess of the peace between her and Mr Woodhatch, and of her perfect confidence in him, despite the old store doubts which the world had had—was the first to pass from the shelter of the old farm to the universal shelter which Mother Earth affords.

There had been no display, however, and Skegs Shore folk were hardly satisfied. It was not a funeral worthy of John Woodhatch. There were no feathers as mutes, and as for the black hat-bands and streamers, necessary for all decent mourners, they had been irreverently ignored. John Woodhatch had simply carried out Miss Brake's instructions; he had acted mechanically through it all. It was the living, not the dead, which was affecting him. Here was one friend gone, at least one who had trusted him to the last, and against whom he had not a word to say. What might have been, had she lived longer, he did not know, he did not care to know. That she would have drifted from him he was perfectly assured. People tired of him as soon [illegible] desperately sick of him and his philanthropy together, and hurried away, with a few commanding protestations of regard, leaving him and his shallow theories together, and to die together, for what they knew as cared. This was John Woodhatch's conviction, and it did not add any brightness to his face when they were all back again at the farm, and the blinds were drawn up, and life seemed to have recommenced in the great house.

"I'm thinking ye're a bit too much oppressed, John, by all this," said Parson Larcom, ruminatively, "and yet I've never thought ye a man to give way like a child."

"I have always fancied myself terribly strong," answered the other; "but then it was all fancy."

"She's at rest now, poor soul; and life on earth was not a particularly happy one to her, I take it," added Mr Larcom.

"I'm not thinking of her," answered the farmer, restlessly; "so you need not preach me a sermon on the vanities of life. I do not need any consolation, Alec; I am quite resigned."

"That's well."

"Where is Lucy?—where is Morice?"

"Lucy is packing up, I think, and Morice is with her," was the reply.

"Ah, you! packing up to go away; that's true. When do you leave here, old man?" he asked, carelessly.

"To-morrow."

"And you think of going abroad?"

"Presently—very soon, that is," said Mr Larcom. "There is all this French law and French money to look after, and Lucy is not as strong as she should be, and I'm thinking a change will not do me any harm."

"Change is good for us all," John Woodhatch answered, absently; "but then it is a world of change, if we only wait patiently."

"And talking about waiting, John," remarked the parson, "it strikes me that ye show a most descended reluctance to read the poor thing's last will and testament. It's very wonderful," he added, "but ye don't seem to care what becomes of her money."

"I do not care."

"Ye would not care if she had not left ye a penny, I'll be bound," he remarked.

"She has not left me a penny," came the echo back.

"Oh! ye know, then."

"She told me long ago I should only waste her money on the vile and criminal, as the hopelessly base and the desperately ungrateful," answered John Woodhatch, "and no money would never be of any good in my hands. She was a far-seeing woman, and God knows, Alec, she was right enough."

He leaned forward, clasped his big brown hands together, and looked sternly ahead of him. Mr Larcom filled his pipe slowly, and regarded his friend sideways during the process.

"What has happened, John?"

"Very little you would care to hear."

"Ye have been disappointed in Greg," said the parson, "I see that."

"Yes."

"And Kitty?" he added, shrewdly. "Is Kitty one?"

"Yes."

"I told ye long ago that scheme of yours would all end unsatisfactorily," said the parson. "I was sure of it long ago. Ye did not go the right way to work, John, from the very first."

"What would you have done?" asked the other sharply. "Here were two souls to be saved, and it was my task to save them. Where has been the mistake?"

Alec Larcom was always ready for argument; flint and steel would not more surely bring forth sparks of fire than the words of those two men in disputation. Two men of strong opinions, and of contrary opinions, and both dogged and vain for all their rough and ready virtues, it was only Lucy's tact which had saved many a sharp contest between them.

"Where has been your mistake, John?" said the other, leaning back in his chair and puffing his pipe complacently. "Ye have thought too much of your own plans, and too feeble of a friend's sensesble advice. Ye have gone on like a blind mole, thinking yourself mighty wise and mighty clever, and that money, good words, and perfect confidence would do everything in time."

"Yes; that was the idea. Why but it failed on miserably?"

"Ye have thought of yourself, and ye have not taken God into your plans. Ye have gone on as if there was'n a God—and that's just it, now," shouted the Methodist, "that's the want of us, good as ye are, unselfish as ye may be, ye haven't been one bit as scrap religious, as trusted to the —to the advance of religious men."

"I thought I knew better than you, you mean?" said John Woodhatch. "Ah! perhaps I did. And where I have failed you would have failed. They would have never trusted you, Alec—they never liked you, not one of them."

"Ye know nothing—absolutely nothing—about that," said the other, decisively.

"As for religious men, what are they? What have they done better than we worldlings, but blunder more, and rave over other people's blunders. No," he cried, "I am not a religious man."

"It's a pity, then."

"Are religious men more useful than we are—more generous, more commonly honest?" he said, scoffingly; "do they not think more of themselves, and of the world?—is not money as much their god as Hire they affect to worship?"

"John, ye're saving."

"And you are forgetting the will, preacher, which has to be read to-night," said Woodhatch—"the will which leaves all the money to Kitty Vanch, you know."

"Gard bless us, I don't know that!" ejaculated Mr Larcom, as the pipe fell from his mouth, and was shattered to pieces on the floor. "Ye have known this all along, then. This is your doing, and ye here influenced that poor mad body to pitch it all away from us. Ye have turned against Lucy, and Lucy's child and me, and I am bitterly disappointed in ye."

"Never mind the money. Go on with your sermon on human cussidus, Alec," said the farmer, bitterly. "What is money, after all?"

"You need not jest—ye have acted badly in all this."

"I here not acted at all. But cuss are welcome to misjudge me—I am prepared for that," he answered, sternly. "It will end the story quite consistently."

"How do ye know all the money is left to Kitty Vaneh?" asked the parson; "have ye opened the will?"

"No."

"Then—"

"She spoke of her money once or twice on the day she died, and told me, I think, in what way she had left it."

"Ye may be mistaken."

"Likely enough. I am altogether a mistaken man, for that matter."

"And this being right, ye could not put in a word, whilst there was time, for me?" said the parson, reproachfully.—"ye who guess what a terrestrial grand my life has been, and how I have never known the common enjoments of life from beginnenng to the end."

"You have had religion to console you, and it will console you again," said John Woodhatch.

Alec Larcom looked herd into the stern face of the speaker, like a man who would see a further result in the words conveyed, and yet was inclined to doubt if there were any fresh bitterness in them. And there was not. John Woodhatch's anger had died away, and he spoke with some amount of envy of the minister's power to find consolation, comfort, relief, where he could not—with sorrow, even, that it was beyond his own power, he being a stronger and more skeptical man.

He went to the safe, unlocked it, and drew forth the will, and Alec Larcom's hands shook as they were planted on his knees, with a faint effort at composure, pitiable to witness.

"We had better send for Lucy," said John Woodhatch, "she is concerned in this."

"Yes, I had forgotten Lucy, poor child," said Mr Larcom.

Lucy was sent for, and presently she joined the two men in the farm parlor, looking from one to the other timidly as she entered, as if in doubt as to the motive which required her presence there. Did she remember five years ago in that room too well just then—the eve of her going away from the farm, when John Woodhatch told her of her father's wishes, and his keen insight of the hopelessness of the deep love he had always had for her? She seemed relieved when she noticed the papers in John Woodhatch's hands, and when John said,

"There is Miss Brake's will to consider, Lucy, and you may probably be mentioned in it."

"Is it necessary to read it now?" she asked.

"You are going away to-morrow, and there may be something important to consider," he said, calmly—so very calmly that it sounded like a different tone of voice from that which he had always used toward her. She wondered a little what might be in his thoughts, or what not in latter and he had been discussing together, and then she sat down between them and waited patiently. She was not excited at what might be the tenor of the document in John Woodhatch's hands; she looked from him to her father quickly and for an instant again he saw that she was broken and the farmer read aloud the last wishes of Baxter Brake.

It was a short will, it had evidently not taken long for the testator to make up her mind what to do with her money, or to arrange for the disposal of her money after that mind had been once made up. And it was as John Woodhatch had sketched forth. All the property of which she was possessed, and to which she might be entitled in any way, went absolutely and forever to her tried friend and companion Katherine Vaneh and on the one condition that she should find and marry Gregory Durward. Otherwise the whole of the property was to revert to Lucy Brake. And she appointed Alexander Larcom and a certain solicitor at Boston as executors to the will.

"I shall decline to act as executor to the document," said Mr Larcom, compressing his lips. "I haven't been consulted to the matter and the lawyer may have it all his own way for me."

"I think I would act, Alec," John Woodhatch remarked, quietly, "it will be for the advantage of your daughter here."

"I don't see that."

"Kitty Vaneh will marry Greg Durward," said the farmer.

SURF RIDERS OF HAWAII.

Owing to the entire absence of coral reef, the surf at all these breaks as those shores with prodigious violence. But in stormy weather this is of course increased tenfold, and the great green billows come rushing in with overwhelming force. These are the delight of the surf riders. Each carries a surf-board, which is simply a wooden plank, and moment is of course almost nil. Plunging beneath the first wave, they rise beyond it, and swim out to see till they meet another, and then another, in each case diving just at the right moment to allow the billow to pass over them. If they miscalculate by one second, the surf catches them and dashes them shoreward, when they need to be good swimmers to escape being battered on the rocks. But long practice has been perfect, and many of the surf riders dive calmly beneath each successive wave, till they reach the comparatively smooth water beyond the swell. Then laying themselves flat on their board, they prepare for their exciting ride. Their first care is to select a winning one. They calculate that every third wave is larger than the rest, and rushes higher on the beach; so their aim is to mount the biggest billow, which carries them shoreward at almost lightning speed.

The rider has all the excitement of a race; he should the ruler fail to keep his plank at exactly the right angle on the crest of the green billow, he will be overtaken by the breaking surf of the mass which follows, and to avoid this must again dive beneath it, and swim out to sea to make a fresh start. Should he fail to select the right wave as his courser, and find himself on one of the lesser waves, the result is the same, as it will break ere he can kiss the shore, and he must again do battle with the pitiless surf and swim for his life. But the man whose skill and luck are alike good has a wildly exhilarating race. He lies poised on the rushing wave, apparently in perfect security, with the tumultuous waters and the dashing surf raging on every side. If he can direct his course toward the sandy beach, the wave will carry him right on to it, but there is always danger of being swept on to the cruel black rocks, where the oldest steerer finds it hard to discern the narrow passages through which the seething waters rush so madly, and often he is compelled to abandon his trusty surf-board, and again turning seaward, plunge beneath the wave and make his way to some point where he can swim ashore in safety. His surf-board is probably reduced to splinters in a few seconds—a loss which is to him as ruinous as that of a favorite hat to a cricketer.

The boards used in Janan are made from the wood of the ti-ti-ri, which is very light. It grows in the mountains, and is much used for making fences, as it is a bindle shrub. You have but to stick one of its branches in the earth, and it takes root, and soon is covered with a blaze of scarlet blossoms. A good surf-board is about an inch and a half in thickness, about eighteen inches wide, and eight feet long, and should be slightly hollowed down the centre, and rounded at one end. It is stained black, frequently rubbed with cocoanut oil, and preserved with the greatest care. being wrapped up in cloth and hung up in some safe manner of the house. It is called papa he nalu—which means wave-sliding board—and is so named from the papa, or sledge, formerly used in a game called lorna, which exactly answered to the tobaggan of the Canadians.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

STOVES.

Open fires, furnace heat, hot pipes, and stoves—these are the appliances which we use for warming our houses in winter. Which are the best, or, rather, what are the chief merits and defects of each?

As to economy of fuel, it is well known that metal stoves have the great advantage. As much as ninety four and a half per cent. of the best generated has been noticed in a stove of the best construction, leaving only five and a half per cent. of waste. In the open fire about eighty per cent of the heat goes directly up the chimney. But in the stove the heat is discouraged, or may be in the middle of the room, in the centre of the air space that is to be warmed, and it must needs that space before it can find any escape other than through the narrow channel of the stove pipe. The longer the pipe the greater the amount of heat that may be utilized. But in the pipes, as in the fire itself, it sometimes is not to be used for this reason.

The amount and the character of the radiation from different parts of the stove are very different. Indeed, the [illegible] a stove upon the heat at the end next to the stove to a [illegible] heat of 120° F., and of cubic feet length to allow the heat to be diminished to 150° at the further end, it would be found that at the [illegible] of the pipe nearest to the stove [illegible] the total heat emitted [at that point] a given unit by radiation to the walls, and only eight per cent to the air; but at the end of the [illegible] it is nearly equally divided, the walls receiving fifty two and the air forty five per cent. In proportion to the amount of fuel burned, the apparatus heats the air more rapidly when it is at a low degree of heat. When it is at a high degree, it heats the walls and the furniture more rapidly and the air less rapidly. The air of the room is [illegible] that [illegible] The gentle heat of the porcelain stoves that are used in Western Europe is even more efficient, in proportion to the amount of fuel used, than [illegible] stove; but [illegible] winters make hot stoves almost a necessity where there is any question of economy of fuel. We need only to be on our guard against their disadvantages.

What are the disadvantages of stove heating? There are two. One is their tendency to make the air excessively dry—a fault easily remedied by providing for sufficient evaporation of water. The other is that a hot stove may give out, in one or more ways, the gas known as carbonic oxide.

This is a stronger poison than carbonic acid gas—one per cent. of it in the air kills rapidly, one-half of one per cent produces serious headaches. It is formed (1) by the imperfect combustion of carbon, or when we see the blue flame playing over the surface of half ignited coals. When there is plenty of draught this is carried away, the combustion becomes active, and the carbonic oxide ceases to be formed. Under ordinary conditions there is little danger that this gas should escape into the air we breathe. But there is no doubt that if the stove be made of inferior porous metal, the carbonic oxide may escape into the room. (2) "Carbonic oxide may also be produced by the oxygen of the air acting on the carbon in the iron if heated to a red heat." A red hot stove is not a rare sight with us in winter time. It is then a source of danger, and be not one more reason. (3) Red hot iron may take up the oxygen from the carbonic acid in the air of an occupied room, and thus turn it into carbonic oxide. Hence there is much greater danger with cast-iron than with wrought-iron stoves. It is materially diminished if the stove have a proper lining of fire-brick. But the main rule in practice is the familiar one—not to let the stove get red-hot. A headache in a stove-heated room should remind one of this often-forgotten rule.

When wood is consumed instead of coal, the shutting of the stove damper, by checking the combustion, may turn the stove into a charcoal-producing apparatus; and when the charcoal burns, enough carbonic acid gas is sometimes disengaged to poison the occupants of the room.

These dangers of stoves are comparable from their benefits, but they are for the most part easily guarded against. Dickens called the American stove "a red hot demon." Unless it be red-hot, however, it is no demon, but, on the contrary, a good spirit. It is in any case a truly American institution, and will become even more completely so as our forests are destroyed and wood fires become things of the past. The era of metal stoves will not pass away, it remains only for inventors to continue to improve them, and for housekeepers to see that they never take on the character of the "red-hot demon."

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE CHANGES.

Late on the afternoon of the 1st inst. the long-expected changes in the New York Custom-house were made by the President. JAMES L. BARNEY was nominated to succeed General CHESTER A. GARFIELD as Surveyor of the Port, and General GARFIELD was made Naval Officer in place of SOLAS W. HOLT, named for Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission. Mr. BARNEY, who is promoted from the position of Auditor, has served for nearly thirty years in the Custom-house. He first began his labors in the customs service under Collector JOHN CHURCHILL, the date of his appointment being May 1, 1853. He is a native of this State. General GARFIELD has long been prominent as public matters in this city. He has served both in the army and navy, in the former wearing, during the late war, the brevet rank of Major-General. In his profession as an engineer he has had much to do with local public works. He was appointed Surveyor of the Port July 20, 1878, to succeed General E. A. MERRITT, who succeeded President ARTHUR as Collector. The salary of the new position is the same as that of the old.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

The first "clean up" ever made by a gold mining company in New York State took place a few days ago on the north branch of the West Canada Creek, in Fulton County. Wide attention has been attracted within the past two years in the gold fields of Fulton and Hamilton counties, and many claims have been taken up. The company which made the "clean up" has a mill running, and had taken out about two hundred tons of gold bearing gravel. The yield of gold was found to be about 93 75 a ton, and the cost of mining and milling is said to be at present about eighty seven cents a ton. It is expected that not less than six mills will be in operation before the close of the spring. The metal is of a bright yellow, resembling Australian gold more than it resembles that obtained on the west side of the continent. It is claimed by those interested that the Northern New York gold fields are "no longer an experiment."

Speaking of interesting feats in telegraphy, a San Francisco paper recalls a noteworthy exchange of words between that city and Valencia Bay, Ireland. An unbroken circuit was made from San Francisco to Heart's Content (some 4,000 miles), the cable landing on the American coast, and the operator there was asked by the operator in San Francisco to see how soon he could get an answer from the other side of the ocean. The message sent from San Francisco was "To operator, Valencia Bay. Tom, what's here what time is it with you?" Almost in signals the reply came "Six o'clock in the morning, and the clouds are nothing down." The exchange of words occupied not more than three minutes.

A tramp recently invaded a Western village, and was taken into custody. The time between the arrest and the next issue of the local paper was devoted by the editor to ascertaining the social status of the stranger, and the result of the investigation was announced as follows. "He turns out to be a regular cosmopolitan—he has no home."

"Run Sociable" is the contradictory term employed to designate a variety of church entertainment that is popular in Western Pennsylvania. It is attended by the brethren and sisters, and every one who speaks has to pay a fine. A brother who attends with his wife, mother-in-law, and a few daughters doesn't indulge in much conversation himself till he gets the family headed for home.

At a recent card party in the house of a London dentist, says Truth, the counters used were false teeth. As they were all of equal value, it was a case of "a tooth for a tooth." The ladies were at first somewhat shy about touching the little white bones, but they soon overcame this scrupulousness. When the counters were converted at the close of the game "there were only three more than had been originally given out."

It is estimated that the cost of a tunnel under the English Channel would be $12,000,000. If a man owning a tunnel connecting England with the continent should offer to exchange properties on even terms with a man owning a bridge connecting New York with Brooklyn, what would be thought of the bridge owner if he should not jump at the bargain?

A man was arrested on a railway train near Topeka, Kansas, a few days ago, with eight gold coins in his possession which are believed to have been manufactured with the view of defrauding numismatists. They are duplicates of coins issued by the government from 1794 to 1805, and are of gold of standard fineness. They are worth as much as the gold in a coin of the same denomination and of recent issue, but if the coins were genuine, they would be worth about one hundred dollars each to numismatists. It is said that the man's offense comes under the law making it a crime in manufacture a coin of a similitude to coins of the United States. If he could sell the products of his mint as new coins for about twenty times their value, he could afford even to outdo the government in the matter of fineness of material, and to use gold in which there should be absolutely no alloy.

Two-cent postage stamps are to take the place of three-cent stamps in this country on October 1; but persons who date their letters 1882 till a considerable part of 1883 is gone will continue for several months after October to put three-cent stamps on their envelopes.

A Chinese lad has unconsciously become a disputing element in the large Pullman car works at St. Louis. He was put to work in a room with the ornamental painters, preparatory to going into a technical school. A hundred men struck. The superintendent says he will not yield to the strikers.

Some curious facts were set forth recently in a paper read before the Electro-technic Society of Berlin by Herr Marcuanus, which came to light in the course of observations made on the German telegraph lines at the instance of the Secretary of the Post-office. Speaking of the attacks of woodpeckers on the poles, he did not credit the theory that the birds mistake the sound produced in the poles by the vibrating wires for the humming of insects, since they often feed insects in the dry wood. The birds spare not even the poles which are treated with such substances as sulphate of copper, chloride of zinc, sublimate of mercury, or creosote. Under the eaves of buildings where wires run into telegraph offices circuits are often completed in an annoying way by swallows building their earth nests between wires which are close together. Contacts between wire and wire are frequently made also by large flies, such as bustards, storks, swans, and wild ducks, alighting on the sagging wires.

The prospectus of the exhibition which is to be held in Cork, Ireland, during July, August, and September of the present year, under the presidency of the Right Honorable the Earl of Bandon, lieutenant of the county and city of Cork, has been issued. The object of the exposition is to improve the condition of the industrial classes in Ireland. It is set forth that the occasion will afford a favorable opportunity for bringing the merchants and manufacturers of America and Ireland into direct communication. The United States Consul at Cork, writing of the desire for American products in the markets of Ireland, says the shortest way to convey an idea of what is wanted is to tell what is not wanted, and in this list he mentions root crops, timber, millinery goods, wood and woollen goods, ale, beer, and porter, expensive clothing, books, hides, serrated waters, raw hay, poultry, garden animals, carpet goods, cheap hats and caps, and sausage casings. Applications for space from American exhibitors will not be received later than March 10.

Something concerning the nature of the safeguards thrown around children who are employed in the industries of France may be gathered from matters recently printed in Le Journal Officiel. They may not be employed in any factory where large quantities of dust or injurious vapor are produced, nor in any work on the roofs of houses or where there would be risk of injury from falls. Boys under sixteen years of age and girls under eighteen are not allowed to be employed in rag-picking and sorting, except in well-ventilated apartments. There are restrictions as to the weight of loads that children may wheel in trunks through streets or factory yards.

It may be remembered that in the course of the Egyptian rebellion the British government bought a ship-load of Kentucky mules, and started those toward the seat of war. The strife came to an end before the mules reached the other side of the ocean, and as little interest was manifested here concerning the future of the British government with several hundred Kentucky mules on its hands, and an owner of strife into which they could be urged. It appears that some of the mules were landed at Gibraltar, where there were already mules, but of a different [illegible]. The Spanish mule's constitution is that he will subsist and thrive after a [illegible] on the nutritious of solids. He did [illegible] with an [illegible] ton in. The Kentucky mule requires better fodder. The advantage over other mules is that a greater percentage of his food is converted into power. Those that were left at Gibraltar have already become the subject of a communication from the United States consul there to the State Department in Washington. Consul Sprague informs Frelinghuysen that "several of those mules have already refused eating bones, but do not seem to take freely to barley." Some complications may arise out of [illegible] as to a question whether their [illegible] tion deprives the mules of their [illegible] protection from the [illegible]

ONLY A BIT OF CALICO.

His mother dead, an hir nor his had he,
And no one came who served sweet Charley.
To take him where a busy multitude
Of orphaned children shelter found and food,
And merely she wondered as they left the pine
Hut called his home for years, upon his face
Sad patient resignation to behold,
Till, watching him with gentle fingers fold
Back from his breast his jacket old and thin,
And tenderly look at something hid within,
She asked, "My child, what treasure have you there
That you are guarding with such tender care?"
"A piece," he shyly said, still looking down,
With shadowy smile, "of my dear mother's gown;
The gown she wore the day she said to me,
'If you are good, and long we'll parted be,'
It gives me comfort when I look at it."
And soon inside the jacket was a bit
Of common fabric, but so glorified
By love of me, the mother who had died,
That to her boy it brighter seemed by far
Than brightest gems or rarest purple ore.

LOVE FEAST AMONG THE DUNKERS.

THE Dunkers, a sect whose doctrines and habits of life are very similar to those of the Mennonists, derive the name by which they are popularly known in this country from a German word descriptive of their mode of baptism by immersion, but they are called by themselves "Brethren." They came to America between 1719 and 1729 from Germany, where they were driven by religious persecution, and first settled in Pennsylvania, where they are still more numerous than in any other State.

Like the Friends, they practice extreme simplicity in dress and speech. They have love-feasts, practice the washing of feet, the laying on of hands, anointing with oil, use the kiss of charity, and other primitive habits of worship. Owing to their aversion to statutes, which they regard as entering of pride, it is not easy to obtain trustworthy accounts of their number, but it is estimated to be about one hundred thousand. They have bishops, elders, teachers, and deacons, are opposed to war, and will not engage in law suits. Their annual meeting, which is held about Whitsuntide, which this year occurs on the 13th of May, is attended by the bishops and teachers, and lay representatives chosen by their congregations

HAIR AMONG THE ANCIENTS.

THE Greek and Roman ladies were th[illegible] long, and [illegible] proud of it. [illegible] Jewish women. The Greek and Roman men, like the Mexican, wore their hair cropped close. This fact appears by the medals that have come down to us. This formed a principal distinction between the dress of the two sexes. A few days previous to the marriage the Grecian lovers cut off their hair and consecrated it to the favorite gods. An old writer says that it was customary among them to hang the hair of the dead on the doors of their houses previous to interment. They also tore their hair, as shaved it, or cut it off, when mourning for their deceased friends. When this sacrifice was made, the tresses were consumed on the funeral pyre of the corpse. The ancients, we are told, imagined that as person could die till a lock of hair was cut off; and this act, they supposed, was performed by the invisible hand of death, or Iris, as some other messenger of the gods. This hair thus cut off consecrated the person to the infernal deities, under whose jurisdiction the dead were supposed to be. It was a sort of first fruits which sanctified the whole. Whatever was the fashion with respect to the hair, slaves were not allowed to imitate the mode of their masters. The hair of the slaves was cut in a peculiar fashion, which was instantly changed when they obtained their freedom.

The use of artificial hair is of very remote origin. It was used by the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and Carthaginians. The trade in human hair was a regular traffic with the Romans. The favorite blonde hair of Germany was largely imported into Rome in the days of Ovid, and those Roman dames who did not wear wigs, and yet wished to conform to the fashion, powdered their hair with a kind of gold-dust. Dyeing the hair was greatly practiced among them. "The Roman ladies delighted to pile up their hair tower-like on the top of their heads, while they had several rows of curls arranged formally round the sides, and sometimes pendent curls in addition. Fashion also regulated the style of wearing the hair among men at the later times of Rome. A boy's hair, for instance, was cut for the first time at seven years of age, and again at fourteen."

Among the Greeks and Romans cutting the hair was a great dishonor. Hence, prisoners of war and slaves who had committed any offense had their heads shaved or hair cut.

"So desirable," says an anonymous writer, "was a fine head of hair considered by the Romans that it became sacred, and was often dedicated to the gods on important occasions of marriage, victory, escape from danger and death, and burial of friends, pleading it out as neglecting it was a token of affliction. Remains of this feeling are manifested in modern times by punishing various offenses by cutting the hair, by mortifying the pride, as in the tonsure of the priests and the cropping of the lady, and by marking of the slave by the shortness of the hair."

The ancient Gauls esteemed it an honor to have long hair. When Julius Cæsar conquered them he made them, as a token of submission, cut off their hair, the cropped head at that period being the peculiar badge of slavery.

Gregory of Tours reports that it was long the peculiar privilege of the blood royal among the Frankish kings to have flowing locks, while for other persons there were gradations in the length and peculiar cut of the hair, according to rank, from noble down to close-cropped slave. When a prince among them was excluded from the right of succeeding to the crown his hair was cut off. The hair was worn short by the nobles in France from the time of Clovis; but as they became more civilized as less martial—which is often the same thing—they allowed their hair to lengthen. In the time of Francis I. long hair was worn at court, but that monarch, proud of his wound, himself wore short hair, to the Italian and Saxon fashion, which soon became general. In the reign of Louis XIII. the fashion of wearing long hair was revived, and as it became desirable to have the hair curl, the wigs were also restored. Then followed the era of hair powder, perukes, and periwigs of enormous dimensions, which were swept into the tomb of the Capulets, wherever that may happen to be, by the fierce democracy of the French Revolution. The shirtless Jacobins restored natural hair to its natural use.

Among our ancestors, the ancient Britons were proud of the length and beauty of their hair, and were at much pains at dressing it. A standard authority of the last century says that some of them carried this pride to an extravagant height. A young warrior, who was taken prisoner and condemned to be beheaded, requested that no slave might be permitted to touch his hair, which was remarkably long and beautiful, and that it might not be stained with his blood. Not content with the natural color of their hair, they used ashes as similar it still brighter. One of those was a composition of lime, tallow, and ashes of certain vegetables. As the length of their hair was considered as a mark of dignity and noble birth, various arts were used to promote its growth. The Britons shaved their beards but not their mustaches, which—and it was the custom of the Gauls also—they allowed to grow to a considerable length.

THE FRENCH POLICE SYSTEM.

EVERY police station in the French capital has its cells, but three times a day prison vans come round to clear out the inmates and convey them to the Depot. The advantage of thus collecting all offenders at one central police station where the staff of detectives can get a sight of them is obvious. The Dépôt contains about 150 cells for the better class of offenders, and for very great criminals, and two large [illegible] room strong enough to hold [illegible] These are reached by a [illegible] and fairly respectable prisoners; in the others all the tattered and dirty vagabonds who have sunk to the most abject depth of poverty.

In both halls the prisoners live in common, sleeping at nights on mattresses laid upon plank beds, and interspersed with them are a number of mouchons, as spy prisoners, whose business it is to set offenders "blabbing." Every day brings a fresh squad of these mouchons, and their true qualities not known even to the prison warders. They are dressed sometimes as fashionable gentlemen, sometimes as beggars; they pass themselves off for burglars, coiners, or petty thieves, according to the work they may have on hand, and each occasion is "grouping" certain men. Who are these queer folk? Not regular detectives, but unattached agents secrets, forming part of that mysterious host of myrmidons whom the Prefect of Police has at his orders, and who are paid by the piece. Many of them must be convicts who earn remission of their sentences and dules of canteen-money by acting as spies. As they are only recompensed when they render effective service, their wits grow terribly keen, and they may generally be trusted to twist criminal cat'ses round their little fingers. When a criminal has remained three days at the Depôt he is sent to the House of Detention (Mazas), and there he often gets a mouton for his cell companion. If this does not suffice to wring the truth out of him, the Juge d'Instruction, as examining magistrate, tries the effect of a little tantalizing and moral torture. The man is forbidden to see his friends as to write to them; he is kept in solitary confinement, which may last for months; and he is not allowed to buy any little luxuries with his own money, but once a week the Judge tells him that he shall be allowed to see his friends, to write, smoke, have rations of wine, and eventually obtain a mitigation of his sentence, if he tells the truth. So he does tell it at length from sheer weariness.

METEOR OR EARTHQUAKE?

THE newspapers of Southern Rhode Island and Southeastern Connecticut have contained accounts of a supposed earthquake which affected that district on the evening of February 27. Professor H. A. Newton, of Yale College, who has made the matter a special study, gives it as his opinion that the rumbling heard and sensations experienced were not due to a shock of earthquake, but to the visit of meteors. As a matter of fact a remarkably large and brilliant meteor was seen by the people of that region at the very time, and it is now believed that this body must have passed very close to the surface of the earth, if it did not strike it, producing the phenomena described. Professor Newton says it is a fact that in all the instances where meteoric bodies have been known to fall upon the earth noises and agitations of the atmosphere have been noticed similar to those recently experienced in the vicinity of Norwich. A remarkable instance in point was the meteoric "shower" that visited Iowa in February of 1875. In the scientific report made upon that phenomenon we are told that those who happened to be near to the line of the meteor's flight were quite overcome with fear, as it seemed to come down upon them with a rapid increase of size and brilliancy. "In this fright the animals took a part, horses shying, rearing, and plunging to get away, the dogs retreating and barking with signs of fear. . . From one and a half to two minutes after the dazzling, terrifying, and swiftly moving mass of light had extinguished itself in five sharp flashes, five quickly occurring reports were heard. The volume of sound was so great that the reverberations seemed to shake the earth to its foundations; buildings quaked and rattled, and the furniture they contained jarred about as if shaken by an earthquake; in fact, many believed that an earthquake was in progress. Quickly succeeding and blended with the explosions came hollow bellowings and rattling sounds, mingled with clang and clash and roar, that rolled away southward, as if a tornado of fearful power was retreating up the meteor's path." After and about eight hundred pounds of meteoric iron in masses and fragments were collected from the surface of the prairie, or ploughed up during the succeeding spring. Professor Newton believes that similar fragments will be found in Eastern Connecticut as evidence of the correctness of his theory

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

BY PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

IV

ON THE REASONS WHY MAN IS NOT ALTOGETHER A BRUTE.

THE Arabs have a story of a man who desired to test which of his three sons loved him most. He sent them out to see which of the three would bring him the most valuable present. The three sons met in a distant city, and compared the gifts they had found. The first had a carpet on which he could transport himself and others wherever he would. The second had a medicine which would cure any disease. The third had a glass in which he could see what was going on at any place he might name. The third used his glass to see what was going on at home: he saw his father ill in bed. The first transported all three to their house on his carpet. The second administered the medicine and saved the father's life. The perplexity of the father when he had to decide which son's gift had been of the most value to him illustrates very fairly the difficulty of saying whether land, labor, or capital is most essential to production. No production is possible without the co-operation of all three.

We know that men once lived on the spontaneous fruits of the earth just as other animals do. In that stage of existence a man was just like the brutes. His existence was at the sport of nature. He got what he could by way of food, and ate what he could get, but he depended on finding what nature gave. He could wrest nothing from nature; he could make no produce nothing; and he had only his limbs with which to appropriate what she offered. His existence was almost entirely controlled by accident. He possessed no capital; he lived out of his product, and production had only the two elements of land and labor of appropriation. At the present time man is an intelligent animal. He knows something of the laws of nature; he can avail himself of what is favorable, and avert what is unfavorable, in nature, to a certain extent, he has narrowed the sphere of accident, and in some respects reduced it to computations which lessen its importance, he can bring the productive forces of nature into service, and make them produce food, clothing, and shelter. How has the change been brought about? The answer is: by capital. If we can come to an understanding of what capital is, and what a place it occupies in civilization, it will clear up our ideas about a great many of these schemes and philosophies which are put forward to criticise social arrangements, or as a basis of proposed reforms.

The first beginnings of capital are lost in the obscurity which covers all the germs of civilization. The more one comes to understand the case of the primitive man, the more wonderful it seems that man ever started on the road to civilization. Amongst animals we find some indicate forms of capital, but from them to the lowest forms of real capital there is a great stride. It does not seem possible that man could have taken that stride without intelligent reflection, and every thing we know about the primitive man shows us that he did not reflect. No doubt accident controlled the first steps. They may have been won and lost again many times. There was one natural element which man learned to use so early that we can not find any trace of him when he had it not—fire. There was one tool-weapon in nature—the flint. Beyond the man who was so far superior to the brutes that he knew how to use him and had the use of flints we can not go. A man of lower civilization than that was so like the brutes that, like them, he could leave no sign of his presence on the earth save his bones.

The man who had a flint no longer need be a prey to a wild animal, but could make a prey of it. He could get meat food. He who had meat food could provide his food in such time as by get leisure to improve his flint tools. He could get skins for clothing, bones for needles, tendons for thread. He next devised traps and snares by which to take animals alive. He domesticated them, and lived on their increase. He made them beasts of draught and burden, and so got the use of a natural force. He also had beasts of draught and burden could make a road and trade, and so get the advantage of all coals and all climates. He could make a boat and use the winds as force. He saw had such tools, science, and skill that he could till the ground, and make it give him more food. So from the first step that man made above the brute, the thing which made his civilization possible was capital. Every step of capital won made the next step possible, up to the present hour. Not a step has been so can be made without capital. It is labor accumulated, multiplied into itself—raised to a higher power, as the mathematicians say. The increase is only possible to-day because, from the flint knife up, one achievement has been multiplied into another through thousands of generations. We can not now stir a step in our life without capital. We can not build a school, a hospital, a church, or employ a missionary society without capital any more than we could build a palace or a factory without capital. We have got ourselves and we have got the earth; the thing which limits what we can do is the third requisite—capital. Capital in force, human energy stored or accumulated, and very few people ever come to appreciate its importance to civilized life. We get so used to it that we do not see its use.

The industrial organization of society has undergone a development with the development of capital. Nothing has ever made man spread over the earth and develop the arts but necessity, that is, the need of getting a living, and the hardships endured in trying to meet that need. The human race has had to pay with its blood at every step. It has had to buy its experience. The thing which has kept up the necessity of more population or more power over nature has been increase of population. Where population has become chronically excessive, and where the population has succumbed and sunk instead of developing energy enough for a new advance, there races have degenerated and settled into permanent barbarism. They have lost the power to rise again, and have made no inventions. Where life has been an easy and ample that it cost no effort, few improvements have been made. It is in the middle range, with enough social pressure to make energy needful, and not enough social pressure to produce despair, that the most progress has been made

At first all labor was forced. Men forced it on women, who were drudges and slaves. Men reserved for themselves only the work of hunting or war. Strange and often horrible shadows of all the old primitive barbarisms are to be found now in the slums of great cities, and in the lowest groups of men in the midst of civilized nations. Men impose labor on women in some such groups to-day. Through various grades of slavery, serfdom, villainage, and through various organizations of castes and guilds, the industrial organization has been modified and developed up to the modern system. Some men have been found to denounce and decide the modern system—what they call the capitalist system. The modern system is based on liberty, on contract, and on private property. It has been reached through a gradual emancipation of the mass of mankind from old bonds both to nature and to their fellow-men. Village communities, which excite the romantic admiration of some writers, were at first only for a most elementary and uncivilized society. They were fit neither to cope with the natural difficulties of winning much food from little land, nor to cope with the malice of men. Hence they perished. In the modern society the organization of labor is high. Some are landowners and agriculturists, some are transporters, bankers, merchants, teachers, some advance the product by manufacture. It is a system of division of functions, which is being refined all the time by subdivision of trade and occupation, and by the differentiation of new trades.

The ties by which all are held together are those of free co-operation and contract. If we look back to anything of which human history gives us a type or experiment, the modern free system of industry offers to every living human being chances of happiness indescribably in excess of what former generations have possessed. It offers no such guarantees as were once possessed by some that they should to no case suffer. We have an instance right at hand. The negroes, once slaves in the United States, used to be assured care, medicine, and support, but they spent their efforts, and other men took the produce. They have been set free. That means only just this: they now work and hold their own products, and are assured of nothing but what they earn. In escaping from subjection they have lost claims. Care, medicine, and support they get if they earn it. Will any one say that the black men have not gained? Will any one deny that individual black men may seem worse off? Will any one allow such observances to blind him to the true significance of the change? If any one thinks that there are as ought to in somewhere to society guarantees that no man shall suffer hardship, let him understand that there can be no such guarantees unless other men give them; that is, unless we go back in slavery, and make one man's effort conduce to another man's welfare. Of course, if a speculator breaks loose from science and history, and plans out an ideal society in which all the conditions are to be different, he is a lawgiver or prophet, and those may listen to him who have leisure.

The modern industrial system is a great social co-operation. It is automatic and instinctive in its operation. The adjustments of the organs take place naturally. The parties are held together by impersonal forces—supply and demand. They may never see each other, they may be separated by half the circumference of the globe. Their co-operation in the social effort is constituted and distributed again by financial machinery, and the rights and interests are measured and satisfied without any special treaty or convention at all. All this goes on so smoothly and naturally that we forget to notice it. We think that it costs nothing—does itself, as it were. The truth is that this great co-operative effort is one of the great products of civilization, one of its costliest products and highest refinements, because here, more than anywhere else, intelligence comes in, but intelligence as clear and correct that it does not need expression.

Now by the great social organization the whole civilized body (and soon we shall say the whole human race) keep up a combined assault on nature for the means of subsistence. Civilized society only be said to be maintained in an unnatural position as an elevation above the earth, or above the natural state of human society. It can be maintained there only by an efficient organization of the moral efforts and by capital. At its elevation is supports far greater numbers than it could support on any lower stage. Members of the society who cease into it so it is to-day can live only by entering into the organization. If canteen increase, the organization must be perfected, and capital must increase, i. e., power over nature. If the society does not keep up its power, if it lowers its organization or wastes its capital, is falls back toward the natural state of barbarism from which it rose, and in so doing it must sacrifice thousands of its weakest members. Hence human society lives at a constant strain forward and upward, and those who have most interest that this strain be successfully kept up, that the social organization be perfected, and that capital be increased, are those so the laxiom

The notion of property which prevails amongst us to-day is that a man has a right to the thing which he has made by his labor. This is a very modern and highly civilized conception. Singularly enough, is has been brought forward dogmatically to prove that property in land is not reasonable because man did not make land. A man can not "make" a chattel or product of any kind whatever without first appropriating land so as to get the nut, wood, wool, cotton, flax, or other raw material. All that men ever appropriate land for is to get not of it the natural materials on which they exercise their industry. Appropriation, therefore, precedes labor; production both historically and logically. Primitive races regarded, and often now regard, appropriation as the best title to property. An equal, they were logical. It is the simplest and most natural mode of thinking to regard a thing as belonging to that men who has, by carrying, wearing, to handling it, associated it in a certain time with his person. I once heard a little boy of four years say to his mother "Why is not this pencil mine now? It used to be my brother's, but I have been using in all day" He was reasoning with the logic of his barbarian ancestors. The reason for allowing private property in land is that two men can not eat the same loaf of bread. If A has taken a piece of land, and is at work getting his loaf out of it, B can not use the same land at the same time for the same purpose. Priority of appropriation is the only title of right which can supersede the title of greater force. The reason why man is not altogether a brute is because he has learned to accumulate capital, to use capital, to advance to a higher organization of society, to develop a complicated co-operation, and so to win greater and greater control over nature.

GLÜCK; OR, THE HAIR OF A HORSESHOE.

By LAURA SANFORD.

THE following passages appeared one summer to the diary of a young man attached, not scientifically, but by caprice, to a scientific party exploring the waters of the New England shore in search of specimens of rare and characteristic of classified and curious fish to be shown in the Centennial Exposition:

Thursday Evening, August 8.—Saw her for the third time this evening, and more closely. Think too that I was observed by her, for assuly the goes on further out from the bay than the first boay; her to-night, as if secured by my perhaps, she rowed to the second knee, where the waves are boisterous enough to shake some feminine nerves disastrously.

The same blue boat, the same red cloak falling loosely downward, and displaying freely at the arms and shoulders the blue sailor-like blouse with broad turned-down collar; the same saucy little hat perched above the coils of brown hair; the same grave, richly complexioned, womanly featured young face; the same little dark mottled figure crouched before her in the stern of the boat.

She rows superbly—a long English stroke; her movements are modulated and rhythmic, and in returning, when I had gone some distance in advance, for the purpose of being at the landing when she came to disembark, she sang in a clear sweet tone that lulling melody, "Doems pury," I liked so much when Matilda used to sing it. I had not heard in since.

I made two or three turns about the upper bay, and then darted up to the landing, and had my boat fastened in a well-calculated moment, so that I came up the steps just as her boat touched, to time to help in ascent the small muffled individual, who proved to be a middle-aged woman, an invalid, and not, it seemed to me, the young lady's mother; If so, they were strangely unlike. She thanked me for the courtesy in gracious tones. Then the girl, having drawn in the oars, arose, and lifting her cloak to clasp in at her throat, sprang lightly up the stairway.

A boatman's boy in waiting for her arrival nearly pushed me off the plank in his eagerness to be on the spot punctually, but I was on my guard, and prepared for him, and had so placed myself that she involuntarily took my hand instead of his in mounting the awkward ascent. She did not, however, like the elder lady, affably say, "Thanks", she simply bowed slightly, without looking at me, and passed on quickly to her companion. Together they ascended the hill, and entered the little summer hotel where they are stopping.

Slight as had been her recognition, I felt myself ensconced in my first approach. I had held her ungloved hand in mine, I had seen her face; in fact, I gave that face a brief but intense scrutiny, and it does not disappoint me. The light, a mingling of summer twilight and waxing moonlight, was sufficiently clear to have shown defects if there were any. I discovered none. I have rarely if ever seen a countenance and form so completely attractive to my taste.

What does Hatteer say?—"Our wishes are necessenarers, they compare the shapes we would have them call for us," so to that effect. I forget the precise language. I have been desiring some romantic figure to fill the gap in my midsummer horizon, and this superb girl arrives absolutely. She rescues me from ennui, she revives the lazy prospect with a vital interest. She soothes my restlessness like the balling, tender, charming cadence of "Durmi pure." I shall dream of her to-night.

August 12.—An end to the idle dreaming in which I have been revelling for three happy days and nights. Just, too, as I thought all was going well—just as fate seemed to smile propitiously upon me. I had passed her every day in her walks, and at evening followed her boat on the bay, and met her to precise moment at the landing, the merely acquaint of my intent, and surely not shunning me. To-night I was going to the hotel, to a reading to be given by an itinerant student, to hopes of seeing her there.

I shall not go now. No, I shall bury myself in the cool cabin of our caugly anchored steamer, envelop myself in a drowning cloud of cigar smoke, and listen patiently to the learned disquisitions of my scientific comrades.

Fortunately for me I had not plunged deeper into the insinuating madness. Even now, while hopelessly maimed that I have on part to let in her destiny, I can not without pain uproot the tenderest she has awakened—an interest to which the terms of this meeting gives a tinge of chivalrous excitement. Would that I could rescue her from her hard fate! From my heart I pity her.

Yesterday I was induced by N——— to join him in a walk to the encampment enlivening at this season a sea-side shell a few miles north of us, and leaving him in curious enjoyment of the motley assemblage, I started alone on my homeward track. I enjoyed the solitude as a man always enjoys solitude when his brain and nerves are filled and vibrating with a pleasing image and sensation. The beauty of the day responded sympathetically to my mood. The sky was blue as a sapphire; the sea shone with a thousand spangles; the fresh and fragrant verdure of the way-side justified the eulogium pronounced upon the locality by an enthusiastic sojourner—"The paradise of sea sides."

Not a living creature crossed my path, and I kept to the road mechanically until I reached a tract of woodland very near our moorings, the roofs of the little hamlet and its one white spire were already in sight. Then I turned aside, and crossing a rough stile, entered one of the loveliest forests I had ever seen. It was a fresh young forest, in which nature had been assisted by man. Larches and arbor vitæ and other graceful trees of rare varieties were mingled with the pines and alders and wild chestnuts that were the aborigines of the soil, and the ground was carpeted with exquisite ferns and flowering plants.

Here in this unlooked-for spot I met her. She was with a company of young people—three or four girls, and three ten rather good looking young fellows that I have seen hanging around the piazza of the hotel for a day or two. Her arms were laden with ferns, she looked like a wood nymph of a poet's dream, and as I passed her, gun in hand—I have always noticed that a dangerous weapon is attractive to women—she glanced first at that, with a startled shy questioning, as if to ask, "Is it loaded?" and then at me, very briefly, but fully and trustingly, as if to answer the confident, "But you will carry it safely." It was the first time our eyes had met; and so, lifting my hat with all deference, I went on, I felt an exhilaration, a mental intoxication, such as on experience of "Drink to me only with thine eyes, and I will pledge with mine," had ever before produced in my rather unsusceptible nature. I was unfeignedly happy. But all is over now. That was yesterday. This is to-day.

Fog was not on the bay last evening. It was brilliant moonlight. I had been down to the south beach with Dr. D———, to inspect the dazzling carcass of a magnificent specimen in D———'s line—a fish nailed with great scales of pearl and silver, a creature with a tremendous name, and from the Gulf of Mexico, which opportunely, as if divining his advantage of being made immortal, had floated into these waters under the very eyes and noses of our savants.

It was late, and we were returning past the hill, when I observed two figures in the arbor on the knoll that filled me with dismay. There the stood in the arch of the arbor, draped in some delicate texture that wrapped her form and enveloped her head like a white vapor, looking off at the sea view, and at her side, very near her, a mammoth specimen of humanity, a full bearded imperial giant. Could he be her husband? With whom else would she at the late hour be separated from the group on the piazza in all the boldness of an observed tête-à-tête?

I was base enough to wish that this human monster, like that of another group, had chosen to fling himself upon our shores in an inanimate state. I could have relished stoning him with ammonal mixture. My blood-thirsty rage abated when I reached my cabin, the air of that little wave-rocked domicile was haunted with flattering reverie. And its very first suggestion was, "Repress your jealousy, the man may be her brother."

I had not, however, after an uneasy slumber, recovered my spirits by morning. After breakfast, declining to accompany my friends in a pictorial expedition, I took a book in my hand and ensconced, in a dejected mood, up the highroad to the way-side forest where I had met her. The sky was as bright as yesterday, the waves as sparkling, her they were on longer in accord with my musings. My day-dream was vanishing, and leaving me unmistakably lonely.

When I reached the hill top near the stile that crossed the stone wall into the wood the breath of the sea came up so invigoratingly that I rested myself on the sward, green and fragrant with clovers to the wall's ridge. I opened my book and began listlessly to read. Presently my attention became riveted by the well-turned subject, and I should have gone on very well for an hour or two but for the sound of voices.

The voices were on the other side of the wall, not immediately near, so I should have felt it perhaps my duty to discover myself, but at some little distance, and evidently retreating. I heard them quite distinctly. A man and a woman were talking.

"I can make any woman love me," said the man, "if I put my mind to it."

"You can not make me," said the woman.

"Because you are not my wife," he answered. "Any man who determinedly and consistently endeavors to win the affections of a woman whom he has either courted or forced into his possession is sure to win her in the end. It is the nature of women to yield her heart to the steadfast and supreme devotion of man; that is, if her heart be not preoccupied. And yours is not preoccupied, Alicia."

"Sir, my life has been of the peculiar vicissitude that makes it impossible for a girl to think of any other love than that which belongs to her parents. I have seen in the course of our long and rapid journeys a few young men who seemed attractive to me, that is all. I love my father dearly, devotedly—unto death, if that need be. Otherwise my heart is, as you say, not preoccupied."

"That is all I ask," said the other—"a fair field. I ask none fairer than your sweet soul, Alicia."

His voice fell, and I know not what followed.

Presently she replied to some question inaudible, and though the space was increasing between us, the fine flute-like penetrating tones of the utterance caused every word of this answer to reach me.

"Because, Norman, something within me, and something very strong too, rebels against coercion. I consider you ungenerous, yes, cruel, in this last demand upon my poor father, so broken down by his misfortunes that he is not capable of perceiving the ignominy which he is precipitating upon his daughter. I shall not desert him. I shall sacrifice myself if it must be. But oh, why can not you be generous, be manly? Surely, surely you have reaped enough from this connection. He has lost everything, you have gained all. You have houses, lands, riches, all, of that kind. Oh, do not urge them upon me as a money! Wealth has no attraction for me. I know its hollowness; I have seen its instability. Why can not you let me go with the rest, and still save his good name? Why here me, an innocent girl, in the miserable ashes?"

"Because I will not," answered the man, and the voice reached me in its accused emphasis though the lengthening distance. I heard no more. But a few minutes later I saw the forms emerging from the gateway to the valley, and walking together down the ravine toward the bridge. There was no mistaking them: the one was the herculean stranger I saw last night in the moon-lit arbor, the girl, Alicia, was my—well, let me call her my day-dream.

August 13.—Thirteen the number of separation. I recollect that doom pronounced upon this particular combination by "Palmoni." I recollect it because it falls true to me to-day. We are separated. But I have a keepsake of our parting.

It is Sunday, and I have been to church in that rustic place of worship marked by the one spire of the village. She must have been there too, but I did not see her until returning home. Her prayer-book was in her hand, and she was attended only by the dark-veiled lady who had been her companion in the boat.

She walked slowly, probably in compliance with the languid pace of her invalid friend, and they were far behind the other people. I had lingered after service to go into the little churchyard—a strange, quaint place, filled with graves of not lovers and their wives and children, and with stones for embaried sailors who had perished at sea—a pathetic nook, planted thick with sweet shrubs, almost like a garden, on the wild sea-coast.

If it had not been for this lingering I should not have seen her, as it was, I followed directly in her footsteps. She paused presently as if looking at some object on the ground, but whatever it was, she did not stoop and lift it. I saw what it was when I came up—not a dead bird as I had fancied, or a dropped letter, to anything, indeed, but a cast horseshoe—a battered thing enough, wayworn and travel-marked.

"Go back for it, Ally." I heard the elder lady say. "I have a superstition about a horseshoe, especially one cast in your way, and on a Sunday. Go back for it, my dear, if not for yourself, for me."

The young lady turned back and came toward me. I lifted the runaway toy of superstition from the dust and gave it to her. She did not simply accept the act, as she had my former courtesies, with a silent and glance-averted motion of her queenly head. This time she looked at me, and not only that—she spoke to me.

"It is for some one," she said, "who does not know of Fate, and who believes in Luck. Thank you." As she took it her hand rested its hold upon her prayer book, and a wild rose that had been set between its leaves, as a mark perhaps for the lesson of the day, fluttered to the ground.

"May I have it?" I asked, quickly.

"It seems to belong to you," she answered, with a voice like one whose heart is broken, or like one who belongs to a far-off world. And she was gone.

Conscious through my mental mist of mingled joy and sorrow, my astonishment at her venture of addressing me, my knowledge of her darkly imposed destiny, and my observation that the ladies quickened their pace as they left me, I stood still.

I remained I know not how long, where I was, on that breezy hill-top, swayed by the gentle forests, haunted by the cool strange breath of the limitless sea. Shall I ever forget it?

August 17.—So much for a sentimental episode—a fruitless day-dream! I saw the three figures, Alicia leading, enter the cars for the north this morning early when I went for my letters. And to-night we leave in our staunch little steamers, bound southward."

This closed for the season the midsummer diary of Theodore Elwood.

A faded woman, no longer vitally attractive, but still vividly intelligent, sobered but not dulled by life's experience, saddened yet not imbittered by the revolutions of opened years, and chastened by a pitying insight into "the woes of all the world." Such a woman makes a wise counsellor and an excellent friend.

So Theodore Elwood thought, probably, when he made a confidante of Mrs Manning, a lady many years his senior, and in years gone by a school friend of his mother, who upon her death-bed had spoken lovingly of Grace Manning to her son, than in his boyhood, and left in the dangerous position of being heir to a large fortune, and with no near relative to give him judicious care.

He was sitting in a pensive mood in Mrs Manning's sunny parlor, and the drew her friendly arm-chair nearer him as he spoke.

"I have made up my mind to offer myself to Matilda."

"You have been a long time about it, Theodore."

"Yes; because I have never been quite satisfied. I know that she is all that the world approves, all that a roving fellow like myself ought to respect. But the has never filled my heart entirely. And of late—for the last two years, in fact—she has been a second choice."

"Why not offer yourself to your first choice, then?"

"My first choice is only a day dream," said Theodore Elwood, sadly. "And in him been a potent one. I did not realize at the time how much it was to me, to I should have followed the clew I could then have obtained to the reality, and have saved her, perhaps, and saved myself. I was a senseless dolt that I did not. But I did not then, I see, realize how deeply the adventure had taken hold of me. I did not comprehend at the moment what I have learned bitterly since, that "—Dreams in their development have breath,

And tears, and terrors, and the touch of joy;
They have a weight upon our waking thoughts,
And make us what we are, what they will,
And shake us with the vision that's gone by."

"Theodore," said Mrs Manning, "you are a young man yet. You have excellent capabilities in your character for a true and exalted married life—the highest type of happiness granted, I do believe, to one pilgrimage on earth. If I were you, I would wait. I would take all means to discover the trace of the woman you call your first choice. It may be that to me her again would be to you merely the relief of disenchantment, and the discovery that, after all, Matilda is your ruling love. But I would wait. It seems to me that a man is hardly justified in giving to his wife a place that his heart secretly confesses to be a second choice."

Theodore Elwood heard her not. He had leaped, like one galvanized, from his pensive attitude in the chair, and had rushed to the closed door against whose panel hung a little object that suddenly had caught and now engrossed his attention with an intensity of interest that, unexplained, was absurd.

"Where did you get this?" he cried. "Tell me, who gave you this? Strange, strange, that it should come upon me to-day! This day, of all the days in my life!"

Mrs Manning stared at her guest in amazement. "Is it possible," she exclaimed, "that you see an superstitious? Is that obsolete form of witchcraft not extinct? Has it, Theodore? Or have you a religious faith in the old mystic emblem of the shape of the magnet—of the 'parted fingers' giving 'avaunt' to ill? You must have, I think, to be so excited in the moment of your earnest debate with and counsel with yourself by the apparition of what seems to me an idle toy."

For the object upon which he looked with eyes startled from their calm orbits, with dismay or delight—no observer could not determine which—was nothing more than a horseshoe fastened against the door, in compliance with a trivial fashion of the day—a painted horseshoe, gilded at the ends, and garnished with wild roses, and the motto interweaving the pink petals and green leaves, "Happiness is a wayside flower."

Theodore Elwood answered not a word. He merely repeated, "Tell me where you found this, dear Mrs. Manning. Tell me who gave you this."

And then he in his turn was astonished. For Mrs. Manning, the very impersonation of quiet dignity and matronly shawlness of impulse, arose in her turn and paced the room like one demented.

"Why have I been so blind?" she murmured to herself. "Why have I never held those two together in my thoughts? My eyes are opened now, and perhaps 'tis not too late. Theodore," she said, and the tone of her voice, [illegible] not loud, was so excited that it almost [illegible] of her friend, "[illegible] here.

He [illegible] but he had no [illegible] than she said, in a tone equally [illegible] do way I can not talk to [illegible] to-day. I guest be alone awhile. I have a—an engagement soon. Go home, my dear boy, and come back to me this evening at eight. No, stay, come Saturday evening at eight." She arose with the air of one dismissing her guest. "And in the mean time, as you value my advice, the counsel of your mother's friend, do not offer yourself to Matilda until you have seen me again. Wait."

Theodore waited. And such a vivid coloring had been given by the incident of the horseshoe to his romantic memory of a summer, and his cherished day-dream, that all other thoughts were banished. So steeped was he in a reverie of the past, and in the vaguely awakened faith that he might yet in the future meet Alicia, that the surprising bit of gossip poured into his ear by a gentleman of his club failed to make any painful impression upon his susceptibility, and failed to cost him one regretful sigh. The bit of gossip was the news that formal [illegible] next had been made of the marriage engagement of Matilda to an adventurous stripling whom Theodore had often met as one in a train of that young lady's admirers, but whom, such an adept was Matilda in coquetry, he had never for a moment considered a rival.

"Saturday evening at eight." What was it that, as he ascended the stairs to the secluded little parlor, thrilled him with a novel quickness of the pulse? Was it a presage of consummating destiny? Was it a presentiment of approaching joy?

"Come in," sounded the familiar voice, in answer to his knock, uncontrollably tremulous.

He found Mrs. Manning alone as he entered. She came forward with her kind calm manner to receive him—a manner a shade, perhaps, kinder than usual. He found her—he, not [illegible]. Some one, hidden at first view by the back of the antique arm-chair in which she was seated, turned toward him as his step advanced—a young lady in deep mourning. He did not recognize her at first, for a year of "wedlock forced" had done its work in shadowing the young features; but an instant afterward he knew her—Alicia! And more lovely she seemed to him in the pathetic grace of that subtle interpreter of all grace—sorrow.

Always grave in its sweetness, irresistible now, as Theodore thought, in its sadness, was the face that turned toward him, and the eyes, they were the haunting eyes of his day-dream! Then met his now, in the mingled ray of fire-light and twilight, certainly, though reservedly, with recognition.

That evening was the happiest of Theodore Elwood's life, the happiest, because it held the bud of all most precious that the years stored for him.

How much was said! how much still dearer was left unsaid! Mrs. Manning went in and out during the three hours that the visit lasted, so there was interval for brief interchange of comprehensive words, and for a few confiding glances.

He learned that evening the story of Alicia's life. From the first it had been full of sorrowful trial. She lost her mother in her infancy, and thereafter accompanied her father in his wandering career. He was a reckless speculator, and in some of his ventures his name became, if not tarnished, at least suspiciously compromised. It was at that time that the unprincipled Norman Gresham, who had been associated with him in financial matters, and held him in his power, demanded, as a return for service that no one else could render, the hand of his daughter. Alicia, unable to awaken Gresham's generosity, yielded to the emergency, and, to save her father, became the wife of a man she despised. Gresham died suddenly from the effects of a debauch, after a term of married life, which to his young wife was one unbroken scene of wretchedness.

The happiest evening of Theodore Elwood's life, because it held the bud of all that was brightest in his future.

Much was said, much that was dearer left unsaid, but one thing, spoken by Theodore, Alicia remembered always with sentiment. For it was a question that a few months afterward, at the close of a tender and manly courtship, she answered to him on her marriage day, and indeed answered to him [illegible] out by her daily life thereafter.

For a moment [illegible] had been fondling together looking at that little waif of the summer outside the [illegible] "coat of arms" which Theodore had lifted from the dust and given to Alicia, who [illegible] granted him in return the wild [illegible].

And now in their renewed [illegible] read to her the motto she herself had inscribed, "Happiness is a way side flower." And now [illegible] confessed and attested as only love can attune a voice he asked the question. Do you not think that if it were transplanted into a loving home and into a true heart happiness might be something more than a way-side flower?"

"HE LEARNED THAT EVENING THE STORY OF ALICIA'S LIFE."

THE LATE J. R. GREEN, HISTORIAN.

THE CHIEF AMBASSADOR FROM MADAGASCAR.

HON. T. W. PALMER, SENATOR-ELECT FROM MICHIGAN.
Photographed by O'Neil.

THE SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

The election on the eighty-first ballot of Thomas W. Palmer as Senator from Michigan broke the last dead lock, and completed the new Senate, with the exception of a successor to Mr. Rollins, of New Hampshire, who is to be elected in June next. Of the new body 37 are Republicans, 36 Democrats, and 2 Independents. Senator Palmer, who is about fifty years of age, is a wealthy lumberman, and a resident of Detroit. He has never held public office before, save one term in the State Senate. He has been prominently mentioned in connection with the office of Governor, and nothing but the rule of a second term in connection with a faithful discharge of duties as applied to Governor Jerome prevented his nomination last fall. He received a good academical education, took a partial course in the State University at Ann Arbor, but the failure of his eyesight compelled him to leave before completing his course. He then travelled in Spain and South America. Returning home, he entered upon his business career, which he has pursued ever since. He is a gentleman of genial manners, wide popularity, and has business connections in different parts of the State which aided him materially in the canvass which he entered vigorously upon at the final break up of the Ferry campaign.

THE MADAGASCAR EMBASSY.

The envoys of the Queen of Madagascar, sent to this country to arrange a treaty, reached New York in the steamer Spain on the 3d inst. The vessel was gayly decked with bunting. When opposite Fort Hamilton a salute of fifteen guns was fired, and at Fort Columbus, on Governor's Island, the compliment was repeated. The party includes Rainvilaiarivelo, holder of fifteen honors, officer of the palace, Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and chief ambassador; Ramaniraka, holder of fourteen honors, G. B. P., member of the Privy Council, and second ambassador; Messrs. Andrianisa and Rabenina, secretaries; Mr. Ramalahy, aide-de-camp; Anthony Tatum, secretary and translator; Colonel Rosekam; and Rev. W. C. Pickersgill, missionary at Madagascar. The Malagasies are all fine-looking men. Rainvilaiarivelo, whose portrait is given on this page, is a man of medium stature, with a long black mustache. The secretary is the only one of the embassy who speaks English, except the interpreter. The party were all dressed in English clothing, with high silk hats, and expressed themselves as greatly pleased with their trip.

THE DEATH OF PROFESSOR GREEN.

Professor J. R. Green, author of several well known and important historical works, died on the 6th inst. at Mentone, Italy, whither he went several months ago in search of health. Mr. Green was an examiner in the School of Modern History, Oxford, an Honorary Fellow of Jesus College, and a Doctor of Laws. He became known in this country by the publication, in 1874, of his Short History of the English People, a clear, brilliant, and forcible composition, which placed him at once in the front rank of modern historians. All owned his charm of style and his narrative power. The book was afterward expanded into a work of four volumes, and published under the title of History of the English People, which, while retaining the life and sparkle of its predecessor, is a better proportioned and more complete piece of work.

Mr. Green's other works, which, as well as the foregoing, are published in this country by Harper & Brothers, are Stray Studies from England and Italy, Readings from English History, and The Making of England. He had no sympathy with that theory of history which makes it simply a record of wars and dynasties, but aimed to present the real life of the people in all the phases of political, intellectual, moral, and material progress.

GENERAL WOODFORD'S SUCCESSOR.

Mr. Elihu Root, who succeeds General Stewart L. Woodford as United States District Attorney, is a native of Clinton, Oneida County, New York, where he was born in 1845. His father is Oren Root, Professor of Mathematics at Hamilton College, at which institution Mr. Root was graduated in 1865, valedictorian of his class. After graduation he devoted himself to the study of the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1867. Soon after he came to this city and began the practice of his profession, in which he has achieved deserved success. He is a member of the law firm of Bartlett & Root. Although an ardent Republican, he has never held any public office. He has represented his district—the twenty-first—on the Central Committee.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The Civil Service Commission appointed by President Arthur consists of Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, of New York, Mr. John M. Gregory, of Illinois, and Mr. Lyman D. Thoman, of Ohio.

Mr. Eaton is a native of Vermont, and a graduate of the University of that State. He studied at the Harvard Law School, and in 1850 began the practice of his profession in this city as a partner of the late Judge William Kent. He has given considerable time to political and municipal affairs, and has been largely identified with the work of reform. In 1877, at the request of President Hayes, he began to write a historical report upon the British civil service, visiting England for the purpose. This report was published by Harper & Brothers in 1879 in the volume entitled Civil Service in Great Britain.

Mr. Gregory is a native of Rensselaer County, New York, and is sixty years of age. He is a graduate of Union College, and studied law for two years, but afterward turned to theology. From 1850 to 1865 he was State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Michigan, and afterward President of Kalamazoo College. In 1867 he was elected Regent of the Illinois Industrial University. His present residence is at Champaign, Illinois.

Judge Thoman is a young man of thirty-two, and a native of Salem, Ohio. While a lad he taught school at Piper City, Illinois, and at the age of twenty was admitted to the bar at Columbia City, Indiana. Two years later he was appointed a Deputy Prosecutor, and subsequently he began the practice of law in Youngstown. He was elected Probate Judge in 1875, and again in 1878. He ran for Congress in 1880, but was defeated, and in 1881 came near being the Democratic candidate for Governor.

REASONS WHY

MRS. THOMPSON'S

PATENT WAVES

PAT FEB 6 1877

ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS!

1—The PATENT WAVING machine shown in the cut is the only machine in the world that will MAKE A WAVE without the use of a crimping iron, hot or cold, damp or dry, in a moment.

2—It CANNOT UNRAVEL or SHRINK with dampness, as is said to be always the case with crimped waves.

3—They do not fade or crumble, for they don't require dressing or anything else to keep them in curl.

4—They are only dressed with a WET COMB, whether on BUNAD, and are sure to be mistaken for a year without refitting.

5—ANY FRAGILE AFRO HAS to be CURLY MADE, or refund to any of us.

6—BEST IMPORTANT. Having lately seen many good and attractive waves in a PHILADELPHIA PAPER, we wonder that ANOTHER should be made in every manner.

7—We have 10 different styles of THOMPSON'S WAVES, every lady can be provided.

☞ Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves, representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

The Frank Siddalls Soap
a thorough trial

Of course if a woman tries every new thing that she hears of she will often be duped.—But there is no sensible man or sensible woman who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such continuous use of their papers for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they had not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways:

SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water or fuel is scarce remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary, and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes.—It is the only Soap that leaves the dishes Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag dont blame your servants! It is not their fault, for you have given them soap made of Rancid Grease and the result is a foul dish-rag: use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. [illegible] Washing [illegible] Wine glasses, Goblets, and all [illegible] ordinary soap, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass, while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for this purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Marble Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantlepieces, etc.—it is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the sick-room it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat [illegible] but The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] its ingredients being so pure and mild.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—dont even scald them—but wash them only with this Soap and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease [illegible]

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are Injurious to the Skin; The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] has an agreeable [illegible] that is always pleasant [illegible] [illegible] the Skin [illegible] It should always be used for washing the face [illegible] with Chapped Skin [illegible] it always leaves the skin Soft and Smooth.

It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath and [illegible] tooth brush.
[illegible]

PERSONS WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE or WASH RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Where a Sponge or Wash-rag has a disagreeable smell it is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soap that is such a favorite with you. It is the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash-rag sweet and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any occasion to expose it to the air or sun.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing: [illegible] Tonic Bay Rum [illegible] Pomade [illegible] hair dressing [illegible] Hat Linings and Neck wear will keep clean [illegible]

—Try it for washing your Eye Glasses and Spectacles.

[illegible]

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions [illegible]—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used NOT EVEN TO HEAT THE WASH-WATER, and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle
THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; dont use Borax, Ammonia or any other soap [illegible]

FIRST—Dip one of the garments in a tub of lukewarm water, draw it out on a wash-board and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as [illegible]

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as a piece is rolled when it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board AND THE DIRT WILL DROP OUT; turn the garments [illegible] DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DONT wash through two suds. If the wash water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cool for the hands add some hot water out of the tea-kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, and is for the purpose of getting the dirty suds out, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY SMART HOUSEKEEPER WILL KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold: Use little or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

PEARS' SOAP
A GOOD COMPLEXION: Soft White Hands—Redness, Roughness, and Chapping prevented.

THERE is nothing which adds so much to personal attractions as a bright, clear complexion and a soft skin. Without them the handsomest and most regular features are but too coldly impressive, whilst with them the plainest become attractive; and yet there is no advantage so easily secured. The regular use of a properly prepared Soap is one of the chief means, but the general public are so little acquainted with the qualities of Toilet Soaps that they are indiscriminate in their selection, and frequently most unconsciously are daily injuring, instead of improving, one of the greatest of personal charms.

The excellent qualities of PEARS' SOAP have induced the most eminent Physicians and Chemists to give it their special recommendation, and one of the most learned authorities on the skin,

The President of the College of Surgeons of England, PROFESSOR SIR ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S.,

writes, "The use of a good Soap is certainly calculated to preserve the skin in health, to maintain its complexion and tone, and prevent its falling into wrinkles. . . . PEARS' is a name engraven on the memory of the 'oldest inhabitant;' and PEARS' SOAP is an article of the utmost and most careful manufacture, and the most refreshing and agreeable of balms for 'the skin.'"

PEARS' SOAP is absolutely pure, free from excess of alkali (Soda), contains no artificial coloring matter is delightfully perfumed, exceedingly durable, it has been in good repute nearly one hundred years, and obtained 15 International Awards.

To those whose skin is generally irritable or readily affected by the weather, PEARS' SOAP is invaluable, as, on account of its emollient and non-irritant character, all redness, roughness, and chapping are avoided, and a clear, healthy appearance, and a soft, velvety condition obtained, accompanied by a delicate and beautiful complexion. Its agreeable and lasting perfume, beautiful appearance, and soothing properties, commend it as the greatest luxury and most elegant adjunct to the Toilet.

The following well-known signatures are from amongst innumerable Testimonials:

FARMER STEBBINS AHEAD.

[Sequel to "Farmer Stebbins on the Rotary."

DEAR BROTHER JOHN,—

I'm very glad you sent that money through,
By Cousin Seth, and not by mail, as I requested you'
The family's just so much ahead: 'twere best it never came,
If Jeroboam Jones had twined his fingers 'round the same
For that young man has principles fit only to abhor,
And isn't the kind of relative that I was looking for'

My eyes! Millennium's nowhere near, when men so false can be
As to contrive themselves into my family tree,
And on its honest branches graft the shoots of their design,
And make me think they're good because they're relatives of mine,
While under those fraternal smiles a robber's frown is hid.
But that's the inappropriate thing that Jeroboam did'

When Cousin Seth the tavern reached whose clerk o'ershadows me
He cried, "Where is my long-lost one I've come so far to see?"
And so, to fill that father's heart with resurrected joy,
I taunted 'round with him a bit, to try and find the boy;
And coming where I had the luck that hymn-book for to win,
I opened quietly the door, and both of us went in.

The Superintendent still was there: he gave a little start,
But welcomed us, apparently, with overflowing heart,
And told us all about the work, and how 'twas getting on,
And how much money those who gave unto the cause had won,
But Cousin Seth, though much impressed with what he heard and saw,
Said he didn't fix the envelopes, and b'lieved he wouldn't draw.

Just then the door was opened quick, and with a solemn grin
Young Jeroboam Jones appeared, and sidled softly in.
And with him was an elder man, who looked enough like me
To've been a regular Stebbins too, so far as one could see.
But stopping Seth upon the back, I said, "My duty's done,
For this is Jeroboam Jones, your long lost eldest son!'

"My 'long lost eldest son'!" said he: "he's 'bout as much my son
As you are the beloved babe of Gen'ral Washington!
It outrages me that my married life was very much amiss,
If I'm responsible for such a snaskin' face as this!
He's handed you by his supposed relationship to me:
He's the most I have ever seen, or ever want to see!"

As when a fog above a field the sudden breezes tear,
You spied a thousand things you did not even miss before,
So all the facts of the affair, as clear as summer skies,
Straightway arranged themselves before my reconstructed eyes
That [illegible] were not verdurous men, and this no Sunday-school,
And naught was what it seemed, except one old bald-headed fool!

I held those two deceivers out, with unresisted strength,
And by the collar shook each one to my arm's furthest length,
They gasped and danced and skipped around, without a word to say—
Then put their heads together in a new and painful way
"One hundred dollars fifty cents, and not a penny less!"
I shouted, "and I'll send you back your hymn-book by express."

When finally in my discourse a breathing pause occurred,
The Superintendent counted out the cash, without a word,
Which with a manner dignified, I coldly represented,
And still retaining Jeroboam, that scamp I thus addressed
"And so you are the bogus friend and relative, so free
To spend his time a making fools of poor old men like me,

"I'm Superior of the town where I have lived so long
There aren't a man in all that part will say I've done him wrong.
There ain't a man will [illegible] what I'm ordinary keen,
But when I plant me in court I grow exceeding green,
And any kind-expressioned man, who acts a cruel part,
Can always find my mail to home, and house-room in my heart

"It's sad for such a smile as yours to find so sad a fate;
And there's some good in you—at least enough to use for bait.
Without some kindness in your heart, you couldn't have hawked in me,
And so to how you've used your gifts, just pause a bit and see.
I'm gambled, by your calling it a charitable name,
And my self-valuation awak with unaccustomed shame.

"I've done what I'd have whipped my boys for even looking at;
And don't suppose but what I own part of the blame for that:
I thought I saw a chance to make five dollars out o' one,
Which, with strict justice all around, is very seldom done.
But up to that outrageous point, remember, I was led
By your assumed relationship, and several things you said.

"Do you reflect, young man, upon the fruit you're growing to?
There's prison grates a-waiting now to stand in front of you.
There's grief of unexpected kinds, and every sort of shame,
To send you some time from this world much poorer than you came.
Your guilty hand you hang before us sinners standing by What angle do you s'pose 'twould take 'mongst angels in the sky?

"There's hope o'en on the death-bed for a square, straightforward thief,
But Judases have always come to most peculiar grief;
The Lord has pity, I suppose, for erring men and weak,
But no good satisfact'ry place in which to put a sneak.
And when a man wins men's esteem, then thrives by their mistakes,
He makes himself a bigger [illegible] he makes"

Then my adopted relative I seated in a chair,
With ample necessary help, and several pounds to spare
Then Seth and I with dignity bade both the scamps good-day,
Advising them to gain their bread in some dissimilar way;
And as we meandered down the stairs, with hearty round hand,
I felt that I'd at last come out some several rods ahead.

PROPOSALS FOR A NEW PARTY.

TAKING advantage of the political calm which naturally follows the adjournment of Congress in the middle of a Presidential term, Mr. HENRY GEORGE has stated his view of the necessity of a new party. By his work upon Progress and Poverty—a treatise upon political economy which is written with singular clearness, and which has commanded universal attention as a significant contribution to social science—Mr. GEORGE has earned the right to be heard, and to have his suggestions carefully considered. According to the most copious report of his recent address that we have seen, he holds that the usual division between parties is the line between special privilege and equal rights, or, as he expresses it, between the moneyed power and the people. In this country he thinks that the Federal, the Whig, and the Republican parties have represented the first. But where, he asks, is the party that represents the people? The antithesis of moneyed power and the people as applied to parties in this country does not seem to us to be felicitous, because the Republican, which he calls the party of the moneyed power, has done more to secure equal rights than any party in history, and what Mr. GEORGE calls its seizure by the moneyed power is merely the support which financial enterprise always gives to a strong government de facto. Thirty years ago the same "moneyed power" sustained the Democratic party, which was merely the political agency of the strongest and most aristocratic form of the moneyed power in Southern slavery and Northern trade.

Mr. GEORGE admits this fact without apparently admitting its bearing upon his general theory of the significance of parties. He does, however, concede that the party now called Democratic, which he ridicules as a party of the outs, willing to profess anything or to abandon anything to get in, is not the party of the people nor of equal rights, and he justly asserts that there is no hope in this country for a party that does not know what its principles are. The Democratic party was disgracefully beaten in 1880, he thinks, as it deserved to be, and as the moneyed power in his judgment has mastered the Republican party, he holds it to be a good time to reconstruct parties. He calls for a party to raise the standard of a true democracy, and he finds its principles in the Declaration of Independence—which, however, has been the working chart of the Republican party. He recites the principles, freedom of person, of speech, of the press, of conscience, and of trade. As a matter of fact, none of these forms of freedom, except a modified form of revenue tariff, has ever been promoted by the Democratic party. During the life of Mr. GEORGE that party has been the great enemy of the popular freedom and equal rights proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence, and it is singular that he should suppose this party to have represented the people. Its strength has always lain among the extremely rich and the extremely poor. In its palmy day it was an alliance of Southern aristocracy and Northern ignorance. For more than a generation it has never represented the distinctive intelligence, industry, and morality of the American people. It is not to the body of voters who now call themselves Democrats that Mr. GEORGE can hopefully look for any intelligent comprehension or maintenance of the freedom asserted by the Declaration of Independence, and which is the legitimate American tradition.

This perhaps he does not expect, and when he advances to his next proposition he moves quite beyond the sympathy of any large number of persons in any existing party. Mr. GEORGE holds that the Declaration of Independence virtually affirms, or necessarily implies, that the land of a country in the common property of the people of that country, and his demand for a new Democratic party, after praising JEFFERSON'S doctrine of the limited function of government, affirms that one must nevertheless not shrink from extending its powers for the public benefit—the ancient plea of despotism—and not only must the government hold the land, but it must take possession of the railroads and the telegraphs, and maintain them for the people. This is certainly not what is generally understood to be the Jeffersonian idea. It is what is known in Socialism, in which the State becomes a "paternal government," and the mainspring of liberty, which is individual independence and energy, is broken. The address of Mr. GEORGE is significant as the first word of the kind from an American who has ably studied the question, and it is an interesting contrast with the views which Professor SUMNER is unfolding in our pages. The Professor would be surprised to be described as unfriendly to the true principles of American freedom and greatness, and as the advocate of the moneyed power against equal rights.

MORE WATER.

THE Commission appointed by the Mayor of New York at the request of the Senate of the State to report upon the question of an increased water supply for the city have made a clear and decisive and unanimous report. The subject is one of the highest importance, and it has been treated by the Commission with a due sense of responsibility. The present Croton aqueduct delivers from 95,000,000 to 98,000,000 gallons of water daily, and more can not be expected from it. When it was built the population of the city was 350,000; it is now 1,300,000. In consequence of this enormously increased demand the present aqueduct is inadequate, and in many parts of the city the water will run only on the lower floors, or even in the basements and cellars. The Commission have no doubt of the necessity of an increased supply, and they are agreed that the most feasible source of an additional supply is the Croton watershed, which will satisfy the daily consumption of the city until it shall exceed 250,000,000 gallons. A new aqueduct for this supply should not be less than fifteen feet in clear inside diameter. Its length would be twenty eight or thirty miles, and it ought to be built in two and a half years, at a cost of not more than $500,000 per mile.

But to secure the city against the consequences of drought, the capacity of the storage reservoirs must be increased. The present capacity is 8,580,000,000, but in order to be sure of a daily supply of 150,000,000 gallons, additional storage for 4,000,000,000 gallons must be provided. As to further provision, the Commission are not agreed whether it should be made by one great reservoir known as the Quaker Bridge, or by a series of smaller reservoirs on the Croton River and its branches. The Quaker Bridge Reservoir ought to be built within five and a half years, at a cost of $5,000,000.

Here is a great public work of immediate necessity, and therefore a possible tremendous job. A fair amount to pay for the aqueduct would be perhaps $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. But this can easily be made $50,000,000 or $100,000,000, and it will be made so if the control is suffered to fall into the hands of those who look upon public works as mere public plunder. The Commission recommend that the work be intrusted to "an unprejudiced Commission," and that it be executed by "competent and reliable" contractors, and with "the greatest impartiality." To this end it should be as carefully protected against the ebbs of persons known as "politicians" as against thieves. Here is a work the application to which of common sense, which is the essence of civil service reform, will save the tax-payers of New York twenty or thirty or fifty millions of dollars. If the new and indispensable aqueduct is built under the system which was followed in the new Court house, the Brooklyn Bridge, and the new Capitol, the cost will be appalling. But if the people insist that it shall be built upon business principles, the cost will be reasonable.

A DISMAL RECORD.

A SHREWD observer might well conclude that the extraordinary result of last year's election in New York was craftily designed to demonstrate the lunacy and the incapacity of the Democratic party. The Democratic Governor was elected by an enormous majority. In many ways, as in the veto of the five-cent fare bill, and in declining to appoint harbor-masters in the city, he has shown a regard for the public faith and for public economy which proves that had he been a fair representative of his party he would be the leader of a great political change. But the better his action, the less he represents his party. The harbor-masters exact certain fees. The Supreme Court of the United States declares them to be illegal. Nevertheless, ship-owners continue to pay them, and the Democratic Governor refuses to appoint any harbor-master while the system of extortion continues. Common-sense and the least party sagacity should lead his party in the Legislature to support him. But, on the contrary, it proposes to deprive him of the appointments, and, to make sure of the plunder, it gives the New York appointments to the Mayor, who is a Democrat, and the Brooklyn appointments, not to the Mayor, who is a Republican, but to the Democratic Comptroller.

The same Democratic Legislature, against the report of its own Democratic committee, refuses a Republican the seat to which he was plainly elected. The Superintendent of the New Capitol is a Republican, and properly disregards politics in his subordinate appointments, which it happens that he has bestowed upon Democrats more than upon Republicans. But the Democratic Legislature wants his place and that of the Republicans whom he has selected. Probably the enforcement of a great Democratic policy of government requires that the floor-scrubbers of the Capitol should be Democrats. The State Survey has been conducted for six or seven years in a most efficient and economical manner under the supervision of an eminent Commission. The work is wholly independent of politics or party, and has been so prosecuted. But the Democrats quietly strike out the appropriation, abolish the Commission, and transfer their duties to the office of the State Engineer—unquestionably that the work may be put into politics, and that the Engineer whom they hope to elect next year may find the patronage ready for distribution.

The abolition of this Commission and the suspension of the work is a public wrong, and has provoked universal indignation. In 1824, DE WITT CLINTON, after devoting fourteen years to promoting the Erie Canal, was suddenly and overwhelmingly, without charge or reason, peremptorily removed from the office of Canal Commissioner. But the just indignation of the State made him the next Governor. The omen is happy. For many years the Democratic party has made the welkin ring with the cry of civil service reform. The New York Democratic Legislature has had excellent reform bills before it, and upon the motion of a Republican it has prohibited political assessments, simply because it did not dare to insult public opinion by their continuance. But the excellent bills for reforming the service it leaves untouched, or erases by favoring an investigation to see if reform be necessary. The conduct of the Democratic Legislature of New York has thrown great light upon the political situation. It has demonstrated the utter futility of the Democratic party as a means of reform or progress. It has shown the party to be a mere desperate combination for spoils, without principle or policy, without the instinct or capacity for wise legislation, and even without the lowest form of party cunning. Its only merit is that it does not even pretend to be meritorious.

CHRISTIANS AND CRIMINALS.

GOVERNOR BUTLER'S proposition to receive sealed and private communications from State prisoners, and his harangue to the prisoners at Concord, with the extraordinary tone taken by Democrats in the New York Legislature in regard to the revolt in the workshops at Sing Sing, induced a Democratic newspaper to ask whether its party proposed to identify itself with the criminal classes. But no executive or legislative folly is regard to prisoners, no sentimental treatment of criminals, should close any mind or heart to the truth that our prison and penal system demands intelligent reform, both in the prisons and in society, reform in public feeling toward criminals, and in their treatment. Society and every honorable member of it has a distinct duty toward crime and criminals. To say that the spirit of reform in prisons breeds crime by coaxing criminals is to betray total ignorance and an indolent shirking of duty. It is the man who sneers at "treating a scoundrel like a saint" who multiplies scoundrels. It is just the lazy, shallow, stupid indifference which holds that humanity and reason and experience and common-sense applied to prisons and prisoners are mere sentimental nonsense which made the jails of England in the middle of the last century what LECKY describes and what JOHN HOWARD discovered.

We have seen no more eloquent and forcible statement of the duty of good citizens toward criminals than that made by Rev. Dr. HENRY C. POTTER, of New York, in a paper read before the Church Congress in Richmond, Virginia. Dr. POTTER is eminent and foremost among conservative, reasonable, and sagacious Christian philanthropists. No good cause appeals to him in vain, and his aid is as efficient as it is constant. The precise subject of his paper was the relation of Christianity to the criminal classes, and he holds that the present attitude of Christian people toward criminals is essentially unchristian. "The jail bird—this is the fowl turned vilely out of the Christian ark, and for whom the deluge never subsides."

Dr. POTTER points out what is constantly forgotten, that the criminal class is twofold. It consists of hardened offenders and of tyros. Now the first duty of a sensible community is not to permit the former class to become pest-breeders, and not to apprentice the latter class to them to become experts in iniquity. Criminals must be carefully and rigorously classified while within the prison, and punishments must be adjusted so as not to insure the spiritual ruin of first offenders. Honest and reasonable men and women also should scorn to treat such offenders, when released, as the vilest of pariahs. Our duty to convicts is by no means wholly discharged by making prisons nurseries of crime. It is not enough to declare the criminal to be a hopeless brute, to lock him up securely, and to deliver him over to the mercies of attendants who have been selected because they are nimble political runners and lackeys. The same good sense which is gradually renewing our systems of charity must reform our prison system, and those who feel the necessity of action must not be deterred by the fear of being accused of coddling scoundrels. Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY'S amelioration of the penal laws did not increase crime. On the contrary, it secured the enforcement of reasonable penalties. That demagogues may try to propitiate the dangerous classes by relaxing necessary prison discipline is not a reason for despairing of a humane, efficient, and reasonable prison system. But such a system can be established only by those who do not weary of well-doing.

SAVING NIAGARA.

THE Niagara Park Bill has passed the Assembly of New York by a vote of 68 to 40. It was warmly debated for two hours, and Mr. ERASTUS BROOKS cogently and eloquently set forth the reasons for its passage. The opposing argument was twofold: the plan was derided as sentimental, and the cost was condemned as not a proper burden upon the public Treasury.

The first of these arguments applies to all the highest public interests. Religion, patriotism, education, are all capable of derision as sentiments. It is an argument which denies the practical value of all moral and emotional considerations. The actual administration of justice depends largely upon the sentiment of the sanctity of an oath. Those who ridiculed the friends of the Niagara project as esthetes should also mock at the requirement of an oath as Puritanism. If man does not live by bread alone, it is not less true that the highest interests of states are not what are called material interests. No more prophetic word was ever spoken than that of GEORGE MASON in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. "Providence punishes national sins by national calamities." It was a recognition of the actual power of sentiment in national life, and no man who does not perceive it can comprehend the strongest public force, or can be called a statesman.

The second argument, that it is not a proper expense, of course falls with the first. No money is more wisely expended for public uses than that which is judiciously given to public parks and pleasure grounds, libraries, and historic and artistic collections. Use is not a quality which is limited to things eatable and drinkable. The beauty of a public building is properly secured at the public expense, and the sublimity of a great natural object belonging to the people is wisely protected at the common cost. Should the bill pass the Senate, of which there should be no question, there is little doubt that the Governor will appoint a commission of the highest character, and as those who are most interested in the project are resolved that it shall not be a job, there is really hope of the proper completion of a truly great public work.

A MEDITATION ON THE MAYOR.

LAST autumn a great many Democrats insisted that Mr. EDSON would make as good a Mayor as Mr. CAMPBELL, and voted for him accordingly. The argument for Mr CAMPBELL was that the Mayoralty is not a political office, and that a man who had shown great efficiency in municipal administration, who heartily agreed that it should be kept free from politics, and who was supported by men of all parties, would probably make a better Mayor than a gentleman without municipal experience, whose nomination was the result of a bargain among politicians, and who was the especial candidate of the most disreputable political organization in the country.

The argument was fruitless, and the political candidate was elected. His official conduct has been in general what was anticipated. His first appointments were such as Tammany Hall approved, and his last appointment is apparently the result of a bargain which can hardly be otherwise than distasteful to the Mayor, although he has ratified it.

A committee of citizens of the highest character urged the Mayor to appoint to the Excise Commissionership only men of a high sense of public responsibility in so important a trust. He responded that he would certainly use his "best judgment." A Commissioner resigns, and the Mayor appoints a noted politician, the "broker" of another politician, and the favorite of the rum-selling Board of Aldermen. The Mayor has perhaps read Mr. TILDEN'S exposure of the old TWEED Ring. He learned from it that the secret of the power of the Ring was "a deal" between the city politicians of the two parties. He knows the result. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that many Democrats who voted for the Mayor, but who desire decent municipal government, already sincerely regret their vote.

FIRE-PROOF HOUSES AND CARS.

THE experience of the last few months has called public attention with startling emphasis to the increasing loss of life by fire. The catastrophe at the Cumbridge apartment-house in New York, and the burning of the "sleeper" on the Pennsylvania Railroad, the latter happily without fatal results, are the most recent warnings. It is obvious that more stringent building laws are required, and that provision for greater security of life is imperative.

Fire-escapes in buildings, as the words are commonly understood, are not enough. A narrow ladder offering the only means of escape from a crowded factory, for instance, would be choked by a panic-stricken throng of human beings. The proper use of an iron ladder or two on the outside of lofty buildings requires a coolness and care and patience and intelligence which can not be assumed to exist under the circumstances. All buildings which are designed to hold great numbers of persons—hotels, factories, apartment-houses of every kind—should be required by law to be practically fire-proof. It is not the fire-escape, but the fire-proof building, that is wanted.

And why, as the Herald suggests, should not railway cars be built of uninflammable material? There are iron slops, and iron could be certainly adapted to the construction of cars. Civilization is very imperfect so long as increased security in travel does not keep pace with increased facility. The cost of ornamentation in cars could be well diverted in great part to making them fire-proof.

A NEW RITE FOR DECORATION-DAY.

THE grand marshal for Decoration-day in Brooklyn has been, we believe, already appointed. There will be the usual holiday, the military parade, the oratory, the scattering of flowers. But ex-Governor SEYMOUR has made a suggestion which is well worthy of attention, although we confess there was a time when we thought that the ex-Governor could make no suggestion in regard to such a memorial day that we should not oppose. Happily in the graves which Decoration-day covers with flowers many an old enmity and anger and difference, without any change of conviction, is buried.

Governor SEYMOUR proposes that, in strict harmony with the sentiment and purpose of the day, it should be also a day of tree-planting. In many rural villages there is one day in spring when the villagers turn out and smooth the village street, and trim the paths and grass, and prune the old shade trees and plant new. This pleasant work might well be done on the memorial holiday, and it would increase its beautiful associations.

AN ENGRAVING OF LONGFELLOW.

A VERY beautiful pure line engraving of LONGFELLOW by CHARLES BURT, chief engraver of portraits and vignettes for the United States Treasury, has just been published by FREDERICK KEPPEL. It is from the photograph taken in his seventieth year, which is much liked by the poet's family and friends, and it is an admirable likeness, although the expression is a little severe for a man ever bland. It has all the refinement and sweetness and tranquility which were not less the qualities of the poet than of his verse, and it will probably become the familiar and accepted portrait.

MR. PATRICK EGAN'S VIEWS.

MR. PATRICK EGAN, the treasurer of the Land League, left Dublin suddenly during the recent disclosures in regard to the assassination of Mr. BURKE and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH, and he has arrived in this country. It is as naturally supposed that his departure from Ireland was hastened by apprehension of the exposure of some kind of complicity upon his part with the crime. This suggestion Mr. EGAN indignantly spurns. But in an interview with him, which is reported in the Herald, he says that he wrote from Paris at the time of the assassinations that he should resign the treasurership of the League if the League should offer a reward for the apprehension of the assassins. And this course he explains by saying "that numbers of innocent men had been already sacrificed in Ireland, and that the crown had sufficient odds on its side anyway."

This remark, if it be correctly reported, means that the crown had assassinated more innocent men than the Irish party. Mr. EGAN, of course, can see the bearing of such a remark. He declares the assertion of his sympathy with the murderers to be unqualifiedly false. But the tone of this remark can very well give the impression that he held the assassinations to be merely a retaliation in kind, with the account not yet square with the crown.

Certainly it is not surprising that a man who frankly announces this view should be suspected of sympathy with the assassins. If Mr. EGAN thinks that the Phœnix Park murders were simply meeting a tyrannical government with its own weapons, why should he indignantly repel the suspicion of approving murders which his remark intimates to have been only a set-off to the crimes of the government?

PERSONAL.

JAMES BUCHANAN was the last Democratic President of the United States. His life as a statesman and public man covered a long period of prosperity and peace in the progress of the country, and that culmination of political differences and personal ambitions and passions which in his administration as President led the country into its most fearful peril and suffering. The period thus included in the Life of Buchanan, by GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS, which HARPER & BROTHERS have in press, is one of intense interest. Mr. BUCHANAN'S personal notes and memoranda, made from day to day, his extended correspondence before, during, and after his Presidency, furnish such an amount of indisputable evidence as to the causes of events, and the positions of eminent men, Northern and Southern, in reference to the events, than the biography will be necessarily one of the most interesting and important volumes of American history. It will be read calmly, and its revelations will be properly valued, now that the country desires the truth of history as a guide for future statesmen.

"We Americans," said the New-Yorker, examining the pedal extremities of the figure, "are great admirers of beautiful feet in a woman; but these feet are too broad and flat. suppose you trim their sides a little and raise their insteps?" "But, signore," interrupted the sculptor, "the woman's whole weight is resting on her feet, and that necessarily flattens them." "Pooh!" replied the patron of art, "I want ideal feet. So take your knife, please, and pare down the rules." The sides were pared, and the statue was at once accepted and paid for.

Of Mr. BLACK'S still life there is no need to speak. He is a master of detail, but detail is never the master of him; and for giving the very atmosphere, the spirit, the emotional quality, of a landscape, it seems to me he has no equal among living novelists. A COTTON PRESS BY NIGHT.

Few sights impress the visitor in the Gulf States more vividly than one of the huge modern cotton compressors at work. By daylight it is always interesting, but when surrounded by all the mysterious shadows cast by the sombre veil of a tropical night the scene becomes doubly so, and impresses one forcibly with its excessive picturesqueness and truly Southern flavor.

Upon entering one of the immense buildings where these great machines are housed, a strange sight meets the eye. Rising to the height of fifty feet or more in the darkness above may be discerned a massive frame-work of beams and iron girders, holding in its embrace the green whose iron cylinder head rears its crown amid the beams close under the roof.

Beneath the converging rays of electric lamps and reflectors a most weird effect is produced, for the machine assumes the aspect of a grand and solemn demon, who, strangely human, recalling the famed genii of the Arabian Nights. Beside it are the furnaces, whose open doors glow with the fires supplying the vitality of the giant, while about them flit the half naked forms of the firemen—attendant demons of this monster.

As we gaze in awe at this strange scene, a voice rings out in command, and at the pulling of a lever the obedient monster's jaw drops, opening wide a cavernous mouth serrated with teeth of iron. A bale of cotton already squeezed into as small a compass as the strongest plantation machinery, unaided by steam, can reduce it, is for a moment unbound from its fetters and rolled into the monster mouth. The dusk figures of the workmen now stand aside for a moment, one in the half shadow beside the scaffold pulls down a short lever, and the hideous iron jaw rises swiftly, and with scarcely a perceptible effort crushes the bale. Under this one Titanic bite the bitharte stubborn cotton shrinks and gives way like a sponge beneath an elephant's tread. Closer and closer come the terrible teeth, till the four feet tons now measures but eighteen inches; but it has not yet been reduced quite enough; further punishment awaits it. Another pull to the lever sends a muffled rush of steam into the caverns of the monster's chest. With this fresh exertion the great structure trembles visibly, and under the enormous strain of 2000 pounds to the inch the teeth almost meet. It is enough. And now another surprise awaits us.

Half a dozen athletic figures spring like gnomes from out the side gloom into the brilliant light, and passing steel bands through the interstices of the monster's teeth, double and fold them back, and fasten them firmly. Like ofiish specters they seem while thus binding the helpless victim. This completed, there comes to the startled ear a strange cry. At first it is one musical voice rising alone, clear, distinct, quavering out on the night wind, then it is joined by a burst of full-throated harmonious voices in chorus, which sink down slowly in musical cadence, intermingled with half and quarter and weird fractional African notes impossible to describe, but, once heard, never forgotten. It is a signal that the bale is completely bound. The lever rises again, when the huge jaw relaxes, and the bitten cotton rolls out.

With the opening of that immense mouth comes a mighty steam sigh or the liberated vapor rushes up and bends above the sombre buildings like a great feathery plume before the cool night breeze. Heard through the quiet tropical nights, this panting of the cotton presses has a strangely human sound, but the sound as of the labored breathing of Titans at work—the sighing of Afrits. J. O. DAVIDSON.

MY FRIEND FITZGERALD.

I.

I am a little fellow with insignificant shoulders and legs not worth considering. I have no talent, and no distinguished eccentricity. My manner, what there is of it, is timid and awkward. I know that mankind as a species does not regard me at all, and that only mercenary motives restrain my tailor from expressing his contempt for me. There is nothing more to say about myself, except that I have an imagination, which may serve to substantiate the facts I am about to narrate.

My friend Fitzgerald was my antipodes. He was tall and strong and winning. He came betrays his nationality, and his nationality furnishes the key-note to a happy, fun-loving nature.

For six years, at school and at college, we were close companions, and then for four years we were separated. I, being by lucky accident rich, travelled for improvement and amusement; Fitzgerald worked for his living. His choice to be an engineer—I say choice, for whatever he had set his mind to do he would do brilliantly.

When I had got round the world back to my point of departure, I found Fitzgerald about setting out for the northwest of Canada, where he was to conduct a government survey. He expected to be absent at least two years. Since coming home had meant little more than coming back to him, this plan of his filled me with disappointment. When he suggested that I should accompany the expedition I agreed joyfully. The day before that fixed for our departure he came to my rooms, looking nervous and excited. Fingering not to notice his perturbation, I began running over a memorandum of things to be done. He interrupted me sharply.

"Look here, Jack, I want you to go out with me at three o'clock this afternoon to ——," mentioning a small town some twenty miles distant. "We will get there at four, leave again at five-thirty, and reach home in time for dinner."

My time being precious, I objected.

"Do it, Jack. The matter is of vital importance to me."

An appeal from Fitzgerald was irresistible. I agreed at once. At three o'clock I met him at the railway station.

We had been ten minutes on our way when he said, abruptly, "Jack, I am going to be married."

"The deuce!"

My emphatic ejaculation echoed through the car, and then he added: "I should not feel quite right about it if you were not there, and that is how I persuaded Emily. Besides," he continued, after a short pause, "I want you to see her. It will be much to me during two years of separation to have some one near me who has seen her."

Then, the gates of his confidence being opened, he plunged into lovers' hyperbole. I listened silently, my hat slouched over my eyes, and my hands thrust deep in my pockets. I could listen, and at the same time mentally review the years of our friendship.

It had been my habit to scoff—an envious scoff, of course—at his love affairs. I knew now that the time for scoffing was past, and I realized (shall I confess that a woman's jealousy—I confess it) that his love for this Emily would endure, and henceforth he the guiding impulse of his life, whether for good or ill.

On arriving at our station Fitzgerald went at once to the ladies' waiting-room. He returned with a young girl on his arm, whom he introduced to me as Miss Emily Gordon.

I shook hands with her vigorously, and stretched on tiptoe to get a nearer view of her face, for she was very tall. As I stared at her I chilled with disappointment—not a vague sentiment, but a decided opinion that the face was not worth what Fitzgerald would sacrifice for it. The face was fair and finely featured, flushed just now with excitement. The eyes were dark, and though their wavering regard was childish and pretty, and, under the circumstances, to be expected, that it was which made my heart sink. The restless glance struck me not as a trick of the moment demanded by the situation, but as expressing undesirable characteristics in the woman. There was not a gleam of the steady, spiritual light such as it would have pleased me to see in the eyes of the woman who was to be Fitzgerald's wife.

They were married in the Methodist parsonage by a very old man, and the marriage was witnessed by the clergyman's wife and myself. Mrs. Fitzgerald insisted on her husband's taking her marriage certificate, affirming childishly that she would surely lose it. She had left her home that morning with the avowed intention of visiting friends.

She was now to proceed on her journey, and her train would leave twenty minutes before ours for the city. I shook hands with her at the parsonage gate, saying, with elaborate tact, that I had always longed to pry about this peculiarly interesting town. She was crying and clinging closely to Fitzgerald. She held my hand a moment.

"He is going so far from me, and you seem are so long! You will take care of him. Promise me—oh, promise me!"

"I do, with my whole heart," I answered, and turned away from them.

I liked her better. The tears and the sob in her voice had touched me, almost won me. My dull senses were partially wakened to the attraction which such a creature might have for a man of strong passions and imagination. If it had not been for that first wretched impression, I should have been in love on the spot with Fitzgerald's wife.

We were on our way home when he asked me what I thought of her. I praised her in the best words I could find, and thought I was acquitting myself well. Fitzgerald's hand fell on my shoulder.

"What are you saying, Jack? You are as cold as ice."

"You forget. You are at fever heat."

"Then what are you thinking that detracts from her?"

I had been coldly thinking the worst of her. I was startled into an unequivocal answer.

"I am thinking that she has not the strength to appreciate you, or to be true to you. I am fearing that nothing but ill will come to you of what you have done to-day."

I expected that he would turn upon me furiously, but he did not. His face lost its color, and he said, to if reasoning to himself, not in answer to me.

"It was her own wish. I would have trusted her without any pledge. It will be strange if she does not regret this day, yet I stake my soul that she never will."

I said to myself, "He has given her his best; surely that can not have been unworthily bestowed." A dog a grave for my doubts and suspicions, and tried to cover them deep.

II.

We were in winter-quarters in a cañon of the Fraser River. We had had no mail for several weeks, and toward the end of the year we counted that there were a noble army of couriers and no accumulation of mail bags beneath the snow-drifts which stretched almost unbroken for a hundred miles, the distance to the nearest post station. One day, after a week of almost uninterruptedly fine weather, the welcome messenger arrived—arrived on his low sledge drawn by eight sure-footed dogs—arrived in hot haste, with bells jingling, and frost-powdered beard, and bright eyes gleaming out from a frame of furs, for all the world like a belated Santa Claus.

Fitzgerald, as usual, opened the bag, and I knew by his puzzled look that the letters eagerly expected by him from his wife were missing. He kept apart from me all day, but in the evening joined the group round the fire, with a pipe and newspaper.

There was a youngster in our party who I knew was fully informed of the love of Fitzgerald and Miss Emily Gordon—as far, that is, as the affair had been gossiped over by his mamma and her women friends. When this youth, burned to a home paper, whistled shrilly, and shouted, "Say, Fitzgerald, here's a not for you!" I felt certain that he had news of Fitzgerald's wife.

"What is it?" Fitzgerald asked, indifferently, not looking up from his paper.

"About that stunning Miss Gordon—the girl you were such spoons on. Do you remember?"

Fitzgerald took his pipe from his mouth. "I remember. What about her?"

"It is reported from Rome that Miss Emily Gordon, one of our fairest daughters, is to marry the young and distinguished Count Mondella. Both parties being of the Roman Catholic faith, the wedding is soon to be celebrated in the Holy City with great éclat."

I wondered how Fitzgerald could quietly listen to this announcement, read in the most deliberate manner. I could hardly refrain from getting up and yelling. My astonishment increased when, having asked for the paper, he carefully re-read the item; then, taking his great fur coat, he left the room. In a few minutes I joined him, and we walked to and fro together on the hard-packed snow before the shanty.

"You see, Jack, I must leave at once."

"Yes," I acquiesced, "I suppose you could not rest here." Then I protested. "Fitzgerald, let her go. She is weak, faithless, unworthy."

He repeated my adjectives with evident perplexity.

"I see. Your old injustice to her. You misunderstand. The case is as plain as daylight. Thin counts dances attendance on her, her parents encourage him, people talk of them together, and a wholesale manufacturer of lies—a newspaper correspondent—sends idle gossip to America as fact. She is the victim of a persecution. They may have discovered our secret, and prevented her writing to me. How far away she? Not miles, days—ten, twenty, thirty. I shall not rest till she is safe in my arms, for she is my wife. You know it, Jack. They may marry her to a thousand counts, but she is my wife."

Feeling that the moment was not happy for the presentation of views, I presented no more. I agreed to all the absurdities he chose to advance.

The next morning he announced to the camp that he was going to Fort Garry to consult some engineers, and would probably be absent about two months. I was to accompany him, and undertook the preparations for the journey.

About noon an Indian runner came in on snow shoes with an extra mail. There was one letter for Fitzgerald, and the handwriting was that of his wife. I sent the letter to his private room in about half an hour I knocked at his door, and he said, "Come in."

He was sitting before a table, leaning on it with folded arms. As if anticipating and wishing to evade inquiry, he said, "I suppose you have been getting things ready."

"Yes. We can leave at any minute."

"I am undecided about going now. I think I will put it off until to-morrow, at all events. I am sorry to have given you so much trouble."

"Just as you please," I said. "I am indifferent."

"What a good fellow you are, Jack!" he said, standing up and looking at me. A casual observer might have thought his face only pale from overwork or want of rest. To me it was dead, like a fine portrait without any light in the eyes.

I thrust my hands in my pockets and shuffled my feet, overcome by the embarrassment which words of sincere kindness always excite in me.

"Can't I help you? Tell me something to do for you."

"The kindest thing you can do is to let me alone."

I sidled to the door.

"Do go, Jack," he burst out, impetuously. "I can't bear to have even you—"

Before he could finish his sentence I was on the other side of the door.

I felt that Mrs Fitzgerald's letter had merely confirmed the newspaper report. If the marriage which had been but a legal form could be annulled, I suspected that Fitzgerald would do it. I had no doubt that he would scorn to strike the woman who had wounded him mortally. When I fell asleep that night all my suspicions and beliefs had merged into burning anger against her, and a determination to seek the opportunity to inflict on her some imperishable ill.

I fell asleep with this one idea in my brain, and I was wakened from that sleep by a cry:

"Jack! Jack! Help! help!"

My senses were penetrated by the voice of a man in agony, crying for succor, crying to me, and the voice was the voice of my friend Fitzgerald.

I tried to lift myself from my bed, but a heavy weight held me down. I struggled to speak, but my tongue was tied. I rubbed my eyes, but the lids seemed glued. At last they parted slowly, and I saw that of which my mind has never lost the faintest impression. I was not lying on my bed; I was not in the low, square room, with half a dozen men sleeping about me. I was standing on the river's bank several miles below the station, standing there alone in the awful stillness of a winter night in the wilderness. The moonlight was so brilliant that every object was distinctly visible.

I saw not twenty feet from me a break in the ice, and the blue water bubbling up clearly. Above the water rose a man's fair, strong head, and two hands grasping, trying to lift the body beneath up to the ice, which broke and crumbled away from their touch.

He was dying before my eyes, and I could not stir an inch to save him. I saw the beating of his hands grow feebler and the strokes of his face relax.

"Spare her, Jack!—spare her!" he cried.

I was silent.

Then once again he cried, and that sound I think will always echo about the world with me. "Speak to me. Give me a sign."

I forgot my hatred of her, and my resolve to hurt her; I was sensible only of his pitiful pleading. By a great effort I flung up my right arm as a sign of acquiescence.

His hands fell, his head sank backward, and the blue water spark led and bubbled in the moonlight. I shouted, "Fitzgerald! Fitzgerald!" I seemed to spring forward, when the whole scene was transformed. I was sitting up in bed, and the watch by the fire was saying, drowsily:

"What's the matter? What are you making such a row about?"

"Where is Fitzgerald?" I said, looking round, and seeing that he place in the row of sentrymen was empty.

"He went out about an hour ago. He said he couldn't sleep, and was going to shoto up the river to Thompson's Station."

I got up slowly, and the motion was painful for my whole body was numb. I spoke with hesitation, as if the power of speech was new to me.

"Fitzgerald did not go up the river; he went down toward Carter's Station. He has been drowned six miles below."

My shout had roused most of the men. They all exclaimed incredulously that I had been dreaming. I stood my ground, and was already getting ready to go out. The dogged persistence of such a matter-of-fact fellow as I, impressed them, and they prepared to accompany me. When we reached the river we put on our skates. We could not distinguish tracks, for we had recently been skating a great deal, taking advantage of the clear ice, rare so late in the season. I led down the river, the others following, laughing at my expense. Soon the infection of my profound hopelessness spread, and in ten minutes all were shouting swiftly, silently, toward whatever awaited us. When but a sharp headland lay between me and the spot I had seen in my vision I halted.

"He is lying just beyond there. If the ice is broken we shall know."

We rounded the point in line. The ice was broken and thrown up in pieces, and the water still bubbling.

I have not much more to tell. It was afterward discovered that he had struck one of the shallow springs on a sandy bottom which never freeze solidly. The water would not have covered him standing, but the mounting influence of the intense cold and the frailness of the surrounding ice had prevented his saving himself. I offer no explanation of what I have said that I saw and heard, but six men can testify that, some miles away from him, I saw the dying face and heard the dying words of my friend Fitzgerald, and that I led them to the spot where they found him.

He had left a letter for me in his private room. He said that he was going to take legal advice and find the quietest means of rendering void the marriage ceremony he had witnessed. He asked me to look after his traps, and assured me that as soon as he felt equal to taking up old occupations he would let me know. As I read his letter I cried like a girl.

In his pocket-book I found his marriage certificate and the last letter she had written him. I carefully dried both, and as carefully read the latter. What a weak, miserable, cringing effusion, characteristic of the writer! Pages of alternate whining and bullying, ending with this paragraph:

"If you force any claim, my Church will set it aside. That would make a scandal, and I have never been talked about, and I should be very nervous under disagreeable talk. It would be very unmanly and under-bred in you to give me so much trouble, and at least I have always considered you a gentleman."

I swore that she should have cause to be nervous. I knew that such a woman could not be wounded mentally or spiritually; and that the blow must be struck at material comforts.

I left the station immediately. From the first telegraph station I reached I sent a message to Miss Emily Gordon to her Roman address. "Fear nothing. I will arrange as you desire." I signed Fitzgerald's name.

A month afterward I was in Venice, in the hotel with the Count and Countess Mondella.

On the night of my arrival I made a package of letters beginning "My husband," with a variety of tender qualifications, and signed "Emily Fitzgerald." With these I placed the marriage certificate and the last letter. I addressed the package to the Count Mondella, intending that the next morning it should be put in his hands.

I went to bed feeling comparatively cheerful. My sleep was but a repetition of the sleep in which I saw Fitzgerald die. When I came to my senses I knew that I must spare her. I did not doubt then, and have never doubted since, that the repetition of the vision was the work of an excited brain; but the impression was so vivid that I felt myself bound by an oath to the dead to spare her. I re-addressed the package to the Countess Mondella, and ordered my messenger to deliver it into no hands but her own.

So with my own hands I deprived myself of the means of avenging my friend's death, in obedience to his generous and noble spirit, in contradiction to my own insignificant rage and vindictive desire.

I saw her once in the corridor leaning on the arm of her husband, beautiful and triumphant, with her false eyes flickering still. I wondered then why such a woman should have showered on her the gifts that the world holds best, and why a man who, by the mere fact of living in it, made the world better, should be lying dead in a wilderness, heart-broken and murdered by her.

ANNIE ROBERTSON MACFARLANE.

SUPERINTENDENT RUGGLES.

THE newly appointed Superintendent of Public Instruction for this State, the Hon. W. B. RUGGLES, is a resident of Bath, Steuben County, and is about fifty-six years of age. When a youth he learned the printers' trade, but subsequently prepared for college, and was graduated from Hamilton in 1849. For a time thereafter he taught school, and then was editor of the Intelligencer, at Atlanta, Georgia. In 1857 he returned to Clinton and entered the Hamilton College Law School. Admitted to the bar, he made his home in Bath, and there built up a lucrative practice. He was a member of the Assembly in 1876 and 1877. From 1878 to 1882 he was Deputy Attorney-General. He was a member of the National Democratic Convention in 1876.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

V.

THAT HE WHO WOULD BE WELL TAKEN CARE OF MUST TAKE CARE OF HIMSELF.

ASSOCIATION in the lowest and simplest mode of attaining social and common between men. It is now the mode best suited to the condition and chances of laborers. Employers formerly made use of guilds to secure common action for a common interest. They have given up this mode of union because it has been superseded by better ones. Correspondence, travel, newspapers, circulars, and telegrams bring to employers and capitalists the information which they need for the defense of their interests. The combination between them is automatic and instinctive. It is not formal and regulated by rule. It is all the stronger on that account, because intelligent men, holding the same general maxims of policy, and obtaining the same information, pursue similar lines of action, while remaining all the same, free-doom, and absolutely of personal independence.

At present laborers have not the leisure necessary for the higher modes of communication. Capital is also necessary to establish the ties of common action under the higher forms. Moreover, there is no doubt an incidental disadvantage connected with the release which the laborer gets under the wages system from all responsibility for the conduct of the business. That is, that laborers do not learn to watch or study the course of industry, and do not plan for their own advantage to other classes do. There is no special field for combined action in the case of laborers. Capitalist employers are generally separated by jealousy and pride in regard to all but the most universal class interests. Laborers have a much closer interest in each other's welfare. Competition of capitalists for profits redounds to the benefit of laborers. Competition of laborers for subsistence redounds to the benefit of capitalists. It is utterly futile to plan and scheme so that either party can make a "corner" on the other. If capitalists withdraw capital from employment in an attempt to lower wages, they lose profits. If laborers withdraw from competition in order to raise wages, they starve to death. Capital and labor are the two things which limit each of monopoly. Capitalists and venturesman, however, if they have foresight of the movements of industry and commerce, and if they make skillful use of credit, can exceptional profits for a limited period. One great source of exceptional profit lies in the very fact that the laborers have not exercised the same foresight, but have plodded along and waited for the slow and successive action of the industrial organs through successive periods of production, while the capitalist anticipated and synchronized several successive steps. No bargain is fairly made if one of the parties to it fails to maintain his interest. If one party to a contract is well informed and the other ill informed, the former is sure to win an advantage. No doctrine that a true adjustment of interest follows from the free play of interests can be construed to mean that an interest which is neglected will get its rights.

The laborers have no means of information which is or good and legitimate as association, and it is fair and necessary that this it means should be used on behalf of most of their interests. They are not in a position for the unrestricted development of individualism in regard to many of their interests. Unquestionably the better ones lose by this, and the development of individualism is to be looked forward to and hoped for as a great gain. In the mean time the labor market, in which wages are fixed, can see much fair adjustments unless the interest of the laborers is fairly defended, and that can not be done without associations of laborers. No newspapers yet report the labor market. If there were any notices of it, of its rise and fall, of its variations in different districts and in different trades, such notices are always much for the interest of the employers. Redistribution of labor, both locally and trade-wise (or let us the latter is possible), is a legitimate and useful mode of raising wages. The illegitimate attempt to raise wages by limiting the number of apprentices is the great abuse of trades-unions. I shall discuss that in the next paper.

It appears that the English trades were forced to contend, during the first half of this century, for the wages which the market really would give them, but which, under the old traditions and restrictions which remained, they could not get without a positive struggle. They formed the opinion that a strike could raise wages. They were educated or so to think by the success which they had won in certain attempts. It appears to have become a traditional opinion, in which no account is taken of the state of the labor market. It would be hard to find a case of any strike within thirty or forty years, either in England or the United States, which has paid. If a strike occurs, it certainly wastes capital and hinders production. It must therefore injure wages sub sequently below what they would have been if there had been no strike. If a strike succeeds, the question arises whether an advance of wages or great or greater would not have occurred without a limited period without a strike.

Nevertheless a strike as a legitimate resort at last. It is like war, for it is war. All that can be said is that those who have recourse to it at last ought to understand that they assume a great responsibility, and that they can only be justified by the circumstances of the case. I can not believe that a strike for wages ever is expedient. There are other purposes, to be mentioned in a moment, for which it may be expedient, but a strike for wages is a clear case of a strife in which ultimate success is a complete test of the justifiability of the course of those who made the strife. If the men win an advance, it proves that they ought to have had it. If they do not win, it proves that they were wrong to strike. If they strike with the market in their favor, they win. If they strike with the market against them, they fail. It is in human nature that a man whose income is increased is happy and satisfied, although, if he demanded it, he might perhaps at that very moment get more. A man whose income is lessened is displeased and irritated, and he is more likely to strike then, when it is in vain. Strikes in industry are not nearly so peculiar a phenomenon as they are often thought to be. Buyers strike when they refuse to buy commodities of which the price has risen. Either the price remains high, and they permanently learn to do without the commodity, or the price is lowered, and they buy again. Tenants strike when house rents rise too high for them. They seek smaller houses or parts of houses until there is a complete re-adjustment. Bankers strike when the rates for capital are so high that they can not employ it to advantage and pay those rates. Laborers may strike and evacuate, or, in this country, take to the land. This kind of strike is a regular application of legitimate means, and is sure to succeed. Of course strikes with violence against capitalists, or other laborers, or fellow-workmen, are not to be discussed at all.

Trades-unions, then, are right and necessary and useful. They may do much by way of true economic means to raise wages. They are useful in spread information, to maintain esprit de corps, to elevate the public opinion of the class. They have been greatly abused in the past. In this country they are in constant danger of being used by political schemers—a fact which does more than anything else to disparage them in the eyes of the best workmen. The economic notions most in favor in the trades-unions are erroneous, although not more so than those which find favor in the cunning room. A man who believes that he can raise wages by doing bad work, wasting time, allowing material to be wasted, and giving generally the least possible service in the allotted time, is not to be distinguished from the man who says that wages can be raised by putting protective taxes on all clothing, furniture, cloth ers, bedding, books, fuel, utensils, and tools. One lowers the services given for the capital, and the other lowers the services given for the services. Trades-unionism is the higher chosen outcome in idolatry. There is a great deal of it in the professions. I once heard a group of lawyers of high standing assert as an exercise who hoped to get a large estate through probate without allowing any lawyers to get big fees out of it. They all approved of steps which had been taken to force a contest, which steps had forced the executor to retain two or three lawyers. No one of the speakers had been retained.

Trades-unions need development, correction, and protection. They ought however, to get this from the men themselves. If the men do not feel on need of such institutions, the patronage of other persons who come to them and give them these institutions will do harm and not good. Especially trades-unions ought to be perfected so as to undertake a great range of important duties for which we now rely on governmental inspection, which means what we need. The safety of [illegible] Rare arrangements of machines, the special precautions required in certain processes, the hours of labor of women and children, the schooling of children, the limits of age for employed children, Sunday work, hours of labor—these and other like matters ought to be controlled by the men themselves through their organization. The laborers alone know enough about [illegible] to live of in a free state. If they want to be protected, they must protect themselves. They ought to protect their own wives and children. Their own class opinion ought to secure the education of the children of their class. If an individual workman is not kind enough to protest against a song to laborers, the agent of a trades-union ought with propriety do it on behalf of the body of workmen. Here is a great and important need, and instead of applying suitable and adequate means to supply it we have demagogues declaiming, trades-union officers recording, and government inspectors drawing salaries, while little or nothing is done.

The fashion of the time is to run to government boards, commissions, and inspectors to set right everything which is wrong. So experience seems to damp the faith of our public in these instrumentalities. The English Liberals in the middle of this century seemed to have full grasp of the principle of liberty, and so he lined and established in favor of non-interference. Since then here came so power, however, they have adopted the old instrumentalities, and have greatly multiplied them since they had a great number of reforms to carry out. They seem to think that interference is good if only they interfere. In this country the party which is "in" always interferes, and the party which is "out" favors non-interference. The system of interference is a complete failure of the ends it aims at, and sooner or later it will fall of its own expense and be swept away. The two nations—one to regulate things by a committee of control, and the other to let things regulate themselves by the conflict of interests between free men—are diametrically opposed, and the former is corrupting to free institutions, because men who are taught to expect government in questions to come and take care of them lose all true education in liberty.

I have read a great many diatribes within the last are years against capitalists, and a great many declamations about the wrongs of labor. I have never seen a defense of the capitalist. Who dares say that he is not the friend of the capitalist? I will try to say what I think is true. There are bad capitalists, and hards, cruel employers. There are abusively, negligent workmen. There are just about as many proportionately of one of those classes as of the other. The capitalist—employers of the United States—as a class, proper exceptions being understood, have no advantage over their workmen. They could not oppress them if they wanted to do so. The advantage, taking good and bad times together, is with the workmen. The employers wish the welfare of the workmen in all respects, and would give redress for any grievance which was brought to their attention. There are confidentiate of the circumstances and interests of the laborers. They remember the interests of the workmen about driven to consider the necessity of closing or reducing hours. They go on and take risk and trouble on themselves in working through bad times rather than close their works. The whole class of those who have are quick in their sympathy for any form of distress or suffering. They are too quick. Their sympathies need regulating, not stimulating. They are more liable to give away capital recklessly than to be unkind or stingily when any alleged case of misfortune is before them. Time appears to me to see man one-second in improving his position. They still aid him with counsel and information if he desires it, and any man who needs and deserves help because he is trying to help himself will find such sympathy, encouragement, and assistance from those who are better off. If those who are in that position are rebuked to him no employers or employer, that he will be recognized or giving him an especial gain.

PRINCE GORTCHAKOFF.

PRINCE ALEXANDER MICHAILOVITCH GORTCHAKOFF has been connected with the most important period of Russian development, and his influence has done much, both within and without the empire to bring Russia to its present position in the family of great European powers. It was to him that was due, in the first place, the radical change in the foreign policy of Russia which led to the abandonment of the relatively narrow and limited field of action within which the government of the Tsars confined itself after the Napoleonic wars, and to the breaking up of the traditional "balance of power" with the maintenance of which Nesselrode connected himself. This change left Russia free at once to take a more active and fruitful part in the Turkish question, which had so long pressed itself upon the imperial attention, and what will ultimately prove of far greater consequence, to push its designs with reference to Northern and Central Asia. At the same time the policy of Gortchakoff, a fair modifying greatly the relations of Russia to the other powers of Europe, and for the moment appearing to weaken its influence in Continental matters, has in reality given to the Czar a more commanding position. In the second place, Gortchakoff's name will be for generations remembered in Russia in connection with the bold measures for the advancement of freedom and of orderly progress, which, in despite of many difficulties and some tragic interruptions, have profoundly changed the life of the Russian people. And it is the more certain that his fame in the Russia will be lasting because he has himself, by means in family connection in training, and by instincts in habit, thoroughly a Russian.

He came of an ancient family, who traced their origin back to Michael, second Duke of Tchernigof [illegible] by the Wonguitone of Batrokhvin in the thirteenth century, and recognized as one of the purest stems of the orthodox Church. But though numbering some notable characters, the family has not distinction mainly within the last century, and for the most part in the military service. One of the Chancellor's cousins commanded the left wing at Alma and Inkermann, another had general command in the Crimea, and personally directed the heroic defense of Sevastopol.

CARRIAGE ETIQUETTE

THE question whether a lady should sit at the gentleman's left or at his right when riding with him in a carriage has been recently under discussion again in Paris, where the Figaro devoted columns to it. One view is that the lady should be on the left side, as that the gentleman may have his right arm free to protect her, and another view is that she should sit at his right, because that is the place of honor. To our friends who live in the country and often drive husbanding young colts which have been broken to such strength only, necessity is etiquette. They are their own drivers, and they have no groom to stand at the horse's [illegible] while they [illegible] entering the carriage and gathering up the reins. The must have the right hand free to [illegible] the impatient animal, while assisting the lady into the carriage with the left hand. This requires him to stand at the right of the vehicle. Naturally the lady takes the farther side of the seat, so that the gentleman will not have to step across the carriage in front of her, and the gentleman finds himself seated with the lady at his left. He that has his right arm free to manage the horse or spur in case of an run against among, and the only possible criticism of the arrangement is that he is on the wrong side to avoid collisions with vehicles meeting from the opposite direction, and that if such a crash comes the lady is in the more dangerous position. This objection would be done away with if all teams would turn out to the left instead of the right as this country, as they do almost everywhere else in the world.

THE MYSTERIOUS GUEST.

OUR readers will doubtless be reminded by Mr HOWARD PYLE'S striking picture, the scene of which is laid in a country tavern on the old Albany post road, in the early part of this century, of the powerful description of the entertainment which Bill Sykes created in an English inn-side inn after the murder of Nancy. It is evident from the placard on the wall that a murder has been committed, and that the murderer is a fugitive, for whose capture a reward is offered. The rustics at the table have been discussing the affair, and their conversation is suddenly interrupted by the appearance of a stranger of lumbering aspect. From their attitude it is evident that they regard him with suspicion, which he meets with dogged silence and defiance.

THE FUNERAL OF A WAIF

MR. ROSSNER'S picture tells its own pathetic story; but we may call attention to the respect shown to even the most humble funeral in Paris and other European cities in marked contrast with the usual practice in England and this country. In every city and town in Europe every man who meets a funeral in the street, or passes a doorway draped with mourning, removes his hat in token of respect, no matter how lowly the estate of the deceased may have been. Everything connected with the burial is done with a reverence and a decorum which are very impressive.

THE COLD SPRING HATCHERY.

A HATCHERY at this end of the state has for a long time been needed, in the opinion alike of sportsmen, fish-mongers, and pisciculturists. The great and long felt want has been supplied, partly by the additional angling of the promoters of the project in the troubled times of the Legislature of 1879, and partly by the liberality of Mr JOHN D. JONES, of Cold Spring—a village on the South side of Long Island, thirty miles from Brooklyn—who gave the Fish Commissioners a free lease for ten years of thirty-three acres of the most delightful land and water for their purposes that could be found on Long Island. Springs of clear cool water abound in the land of the precise purity and temperature affected by trout.

Where they breed most and burst, I have observed, the air is delicious—that is to say, the water —and among those springs is possibly the identical Cold Spring from which the pleasant village takes its name. The unsalted salt water of the Sound washes the margin, and makes possible a experiment with sea fish which the Fish Commissioners have not been able to carry on satisfactorily elsewhere. There is upon the premises what looks like a humble rabbit, though it formerly did duty as a woollen mill, and this was found to need very little modification to fit it for the uses of a hatchery.

The building was put to its new use some ten weeks ago, and last week took place what may be called the "inauguration" of this hatchery, if Mr. FARNUM will allow us to use so very large a word to describe the visit of a number of persons, chiefly unofficial, to an small a house, and the subsequent ceremonies of inspecting embryonic fishes and partaking of refreshments.

Nobody who visits a hatchery for the first time can fail to be impressed with the enormous value of the work that is doing there in increasing the supply of cheap food. The production seems to be absolutely illimitable, and even the statistics give a touch less vivid idea of it than is to be gained by a hatchery. But here are some of the figures of Cold Spring. There are 300,000 salmon, 100,000 brook trout, 1,000,000 white fish, 1000 land-locked salmon, 60,000 German trout of the smaller and 20,000 of the larger variety. The salmon are to be turned loose, when they are advanced enough to pack up their own living, in the Hudson and Connecticut rivers. The Adirondack lakes are to be stocked with the land-locked salmon, and the Long Island streams with the brook trout. Next year [illegible],000,000 young cod-fish are to be deposited in the Sound, and it is hoped that the result will be an unfailing supply of this Lenten luxury close to our coasts.

The commissioners of a marine fish has but a limited plot of experiment, and the [illegible] ceeds in which they may be seen in the troughs at Cold Spring, are even less beautifully cultivated in this respect. They are in fact, less [illegible] even than a human tube in its passive [illegible] ment moods. THE MOVING OF THE HANDS.

CHAPTER II.

WORD DISPATCHED.

John Woodhatch for once proved himself to be a true prophet. He who had been so seldom right in his life was right in this instance to the very letter of his prediction. It was a little after noon on the following day when a telegram was brought to him, which he read in the front parlor to Lucy and her father:

"From Gregory Dorward to John Woodhatch, Skegs Shore:

"I was married this morning to Kitty. Think us well off as both of us can."

"There the story ends, after all, as I had planned it," said John Woodhatch, in a strangely unexultant tone. "And Kitty Vanch marries Greg."

"She was in a tremendous hurry, all of a sudden," replied Mr. Larcom. "If she had only waited to hear this will read, I wonder what the effect would have been?"

"She would have married Greg just the same," was the reply. "It is not impossible she knew what was the purport of this will. She was a great deal with Hester Brake at the last."

"I hope she did," said the parson; "it will save a deal of quibbling. Greg's a sharp fellow, and might plead his ignorance of the document, and put in a claim for his wife, after all. To see it's not so very clear that Lucy will get the money, for—"

"Never mind the money just now. You will have plenty of time to think over all this abroad, where the money is," said Woodhatch; "and Greg and his wife will have no opposition to offer, I am sure. When do you leave?"

"I asked Fludge to be ready with the trap in about half an hour from this time," replied the parson. "We shall go to the cottage for one or two things, and then start from Skegs Shore by the five-o'clock train."

"You will be in France to-morrow, then, Alec?"

"Yes."

"And the chapel business here?"

"I have arranged all that. A friend of mine from Lincoln will take the chapel in hand. He's a somewhat young man in his way, too, and I dare say will succeed me altogether. And," added Mr. Larcom, "I hope we will extend to him all the hospitality possible for the sake of an old friend."

John Woodhatch looked hard at the old friend aforesaid, but did not reply to him. Alec Larcom had forgotten the sharp discussion of the preceding evening, and was in excellent spirits altogether. Kate Vanch's marriage had followed so quickly on the reading of the will that the fortune was secured to him and his daughter before he had had much time to think of it, and a new bright life was stretching out for them both—a new beginning to all things, with not a care in their way to mar their rejoicing. True, there was something in John Woodhatch that was new; that would have been exceedingly perplexing had Alec Larcom had the time to think it over at that busy period of preparation for departure, that would have even distressed him had he thought there was real sorrow, real trouble, at the heart of the man whom he had known so long. But Alec Larcom was full of his own projects, full of himself, and his daughter's advancement in the world, full of thoughts of the journey before him, and hardly the same man who had struggled and preached and marked his soul out at Skegs Shore. Prosperity would not wholly improve the Methodist parson in all probability, but then does great prosperity improve many folk, or any folk? Were not our friends the truer, better, and more straightforward before the golden shower came down from heaven, or up from hell, to gild their ways in life? And ah! the good fellows we all have known who were poor! and ah! the rich prigs on whom it is a pleasure to turn one's back now!

John Woodhatch was soured with thoughts somewhat akin to these, but he was studiously grave, even polite, to Alec Larcom and to his daughter Lucy. And he seemed to look at each of them, and at little Merice, and even at Reuben Fludge and his farm servants, in no strange a way, as if they were all people in whom he was perforce still interested, and whom he studied a great deal, and to the last, though without any heart in his work.

Lucy Brake, more watchful than her wont, saw this, and more than this, with a rapidly increasing surprise, and on anxiety for which she could hardly account. Presently she came to him when he was alone, when he was walking in the garden with his hands crossed behind him, after the old fashion which he had, and took her place by his side with the freedom of one ever more of a welcome. He did not appear surprised at this, but his face did not light up as usual at the sight of her. It remained still curiously grave, with a meaning on it utterly impossible to decipher in that hour, and for many hours to come.

"John," said Lucy, frankly, "has any one offended you? Have you taken offense at anything that has been said or done of late days?"

"I am not quick to take offense, Lucy," he replied, "and I am not offended."

"Nor hurt?"

"No."

"Nor—nor disappointed?"

"No. I run not say I am disappointed in anything or anybody."

"But you have altered so much; you are not the John Woodhatch I have always known," she said; "since Hester's death you have been so different altogether."

"I am sorry you have remarked it, Lucy, or cared about it in any way," he replied, speaking very slowly; "but I do not deny I have altered, possibly have wholly changed with the changes which have come to us, and—more of which are coming on still."

"I do not see—"

"There will be further changes here. There will be new lives begun and old lives ended before you are back again in Lincolnshire—if you ever come back, that is," he added.

"Why should I not?"

"You will be happier away—much happier."

"I am not fond of travelling. I am no great hand at making friends, and I believe," she added, in a little whisper, "I hate money, and people who are fond of it."

"It is not everything, but it is a mighty power," answered Woodhatch, "and is never to be despised."

"Will you tell Kitty for me, please," she said, very hurriedly, "that this marriage of hers shall make no difference in her future prospects, and that she need not feel—neither she nor Greg—our disappointment at the conditions of the will. For I—"

She stopped as he touched her arm, and looked at her with the same grave, steady, incomprehensible stare.

"You will not harden me with commissions, Lucy, which it will be beyond my power to fulfill," he said.

"I—I do not understand you," Lucy said, with her heart beating very rapidly.

"I shall not see Kitty Vanch on Greg ever again. They belong not to my life—they are completely gone. That's all," he added.

"But why?"

"Ah! don't ask me for explanations," he said; "they are beyond me just now."

"You will write and tell me what you mean, then. For there is some mystery you are keeping from me, John, some secret, some new project."

"Yes, I have a project in my mind, and you will hear of it soon, Lucy," he said. "Forty-five is late in the day for planning it out, but it will not be kept from you or your father. You are both sure to hear of it."

"These mysteries are not like you, and are not worthy of one who has been always so outspoken," she murmured, reproachfully.

"You will bear with them and me for the few moments that are left," he said, very tenderly. "To explain would do no good, and might effect much harm. I want you to forgive me, Lucy, before you go away to-day."
